Mr. PARSONS. Is it not a fact that the city of Chicago and the State of Illinois have already spent $45,000,000 for relief purposes?

Mr. SABATH. The city of Chicago, Cook County, and the State of Illinois have spent approximately $45,000,000 to relieve the poor, and they have appealed for a loan in order to continue this necessary relief. They have come before us because the banks whom we have aided by the creation of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation have refused to buy any of our State, county, or city bonds, or even anticipating warrants. They do not ask for gifts or donations. I repeat, all they desire is to secure a loan, for which the city is willing to give good security and positive assurance that it will be repaid, so that Chicago may feed its hungry and create employment for the unfortunate thousands who are out of work and in need of food.

Some of the gentlemen from the Wheat Belt object to the exchange provisions in this bill, fearing that wheat must be exchanged for other commodities. Personally, I feel that the benefits that the people of the large cities will derive are only infinitesimal as compared to those derived by the wheat growers.

I am pleading for the bill not only because it will supply a small amount of food and clothing to the needy of the cities but also because it will reduce the tremendous surplus of wheat and cotton now in the warehouses that appears to affect the prices of the other commodities.

I realize that it would have been much more prudent and wiser if the Farm Board had disposed of the wheat long before this. But at that time we were under the impression that men of experience and vision and men who had the interest of the country at heart would be appointed to this board that would enable us to market our surplus wheat and other commodities and give our farmers fair prices for their commodities. But, from what you agriculturists say, this board has been grossly incompetent, has exceeded its authority, and has abused the power granted to it by Congress. These gentlemen, instead of bringing about increases in the prices of commodities, have brought about increases in their own salaries and allowances to a degree not only vicious but criminal. As I understand it, one of these men is drawing $75,000 annually and another $50,000. No wonder the $500,000,000 which we have voted for to relieve the farmer is fast disappearing.

Please remember, these men have not been appointed by the Democratic Congress but by a Republican President, who is entitled to all of the credit and glory for their great achievements in bringing about the 40 or 50 per cent reduction in the prices of all farm commodities, and this, as I have stated, notwithstanding the fact that Congress has voted $500,000,000 in good faith to stabilize the prices of all farm products.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment of Mr. CONNERY to the Jones amendment: At the end of the Jones amendment, insert: "After the needs of human consumption have been taken care of in the opinion of the Director of the Red Cross."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that all debate on this section and amendments thereto is closed. The Chair would like to inquire of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. UNDERWOOD] if he withdraws his amendment?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. No part of the expenses incident to the delivery, receipt, and distribution of such wheat or cotton shall be borne by the United States or the Federal Farm Board. In order to carry out the purposes of this resolution such wheat or cotton or the products thereof, may be milled, processed, or manufactured into, or exchanged for, flour of any kind, bread, or other food of any kind, or cloth or wearing apparel; but such milling, processing, or manufacturing shall be without profit to any mill, organization, or other person.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 12, after the word "wheat," strike out the words "or cotton," and at the end of line 12, add the word "or." In line 13, strike out the words "or manufactured." In line 14, strike out "clothing or wearing apparel," and insert in lieu thereof "cotton may be manufactured into clothing or wearing apparel or exchanged for other articles of clothing made of cotton."

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am offering this amendment for the purpose of clarifying the language as written in the bill. Apparently under the present language you could trade cotton for wheat or wheat products, or trade wheat or wheat products for cotton or cotton clothing. This will leave the bill as intended, so you can trade wheat for flour, and so forth, and for other food products; or, as to cotton, you can trade cotton cloth for garments or other manufactured clothing made out of cotton.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment as substitute for the Fulmer amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk may read the paragraph as it would read if the Fulmer amendment were adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. No part of the expenses incident to the delivery, receipt, and disposition of such wheat or cotton shall be borne by the United States or the Federal Farm Board. In order to carry out the purposes of this resolution such wheat or the products thereof may be milled or processed into or exchanged for flour of any kind, bread or other food of any kind, or cotton may be manufactured into cloth or wearing apparel or exchanged for other articles of clothing made of cotton; but such milling processes or manufacturing shall be without profit to any mill, organization, or other person.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE] as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina.

Page 2, strike out, beginning with line 11, down to line 16, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"In order to carry out the purposes of this resolution, such wheat or the products thereof may be milled, processed, or manufactured into or exchanged for flour of any kind, bread or other food or feed of which wheat or any by-product thereof is a substantial ingredient, and such cotton may be processed or manufactured into or exchanged for clothing and wearing apparel made of cotton; that such milling, processing, or manufacturing shall be without profit to any mill, organization, or other person, and so far as necessary such wheat and cotton products may be used for immediate transportation, storage, and handling expenses in carrying out the purposes of this resolution."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the point of order, does the gentleman offer this as a substitute or as an amendment?

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I offer this as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina. This amendment does for both wheat and cotton what the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FULMER] does as to cotton. In effect it provides that wheat shall not be exchanged for any other food product excepting flour, bread, or any other food or feed of which wheat is a substantial ingredient, and as to cotton it provides that it shall not be exchanged for any cloth or wearing apparel other than that manufactured from cotton.

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPE. Yes.

Mr. MOUSER. Who is to determine the exchange value of this wheat or cotton that is to be exchanged for other goods?

Mr. HOPE. That is entirely up to the Red Cross.

Mr. MOUSER. In other words, you are to delegate that right to a Red Cross official to fix whatever value he may see fit and make any kind of a deal he may see fit, without any supervision whatever?

Mr. HOPE. That is true. The original bill does that, because it gives the Red Cross officials authority to trade for anything in the way of food or clothing. I am entirely sympathetic with the position of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER], and I want to see them get some of this wheat and flour to relieve their destitute citizens, but I can not see any reason why they will not get the relief asked for if this amendment is adopted. This is not the only relief measure that Congress is going to pass. We are going to pass another relief measure before we adjourn, and it certainly is not asking too much to say that this wheat which is going to be given away here in competition with the wheat which is now coming on the market from the farms and fields of this country must be exchanged for a product of wheat, and the same thing is true of cotton. If we do not do that, we are going to have wheat exchanged for meat, canned goods, dried fruits, and almost every article of food. The result will be that we will not be doing what we intend to do, in giving flour to people who need it because they are destitute.

We will be giving flour to these organizations to trade for other products. The millers of this country have been most generous in milling this wheat free of all costs. The farmers of the country have not complained because to a certain extent this relief has been at their expense, the price of wheat has declined 12 cents since we started giving wheat away, but I think both millers and farmers of the country have a right to insist that the Government shall not give wheat away to be put on the market in competition with their wheat and flour. I can not see if this amendment is adopted that it is in any way going to interfere with relief of those destitute in our great cities. We will pass other relief bills, and these cities and States are going to be able to purchase other food supplies for the needy, and in all conscience and good faith toward the farmers of the country who are in just as poor condition as any people, this relief ought not to be at their expense.

Mr. O'CONNOR rose and was recognized by the Chair.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield until I make a request for unanimous consent?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Reserving the right to object, the gentleman is opposed to this amendment?

Mr. JONES. Under the circumstances I shall oppose the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] propose to go on with any other legislation to-day?

Mr. BANKHEAD. We had hoped to take up the kidnaping bill this afternoon, but it is so late that I do not think it will be possible to do it, but that bill will be called up the first thing in the morning.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I shall not address my remarks so much to the merits of this amendment as I shall call the attention of the committee to what I consider a matter of fairness. This amendment should be defeated if for no other reason than that it would be most unfair to the Committee on Rules as representative of this House. The Committee on Agriculture appeared before the Committee on Rules and presented a picture to that committee of what they wanted in this bill, and they featured the fact that the products of wheat could be exchanged for all kinds of food. That is practically all they talked about. That is the bill that we reported out of the Committee on Rules. When the Committee on Agriculture came here to-day and proposed to put in a substantially different amendment, the direct opposite of the request made before the Committee on Rules, our Committee on Rules said to them, "If you are going to do that, we will just not call up the rule."

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Surely the gentleman does not take the position that any committee should refuse to report out a bill merely because it could be amended upon the floor of the House.

Mr. O'CONNOR. This is not a question of amending a bill on the floor of the House. It is an attempt to substitute an entirely different thing, a complete reversal of what was requested before the Committee on Rules. When the Committee on Agriculture decided to recommend an amendment it should have come back to the Committee on Rules and said that the bill that the Committee on Rules reported out was not the one they wanted. They had plenty of time to do it. This amendment is a complete change of front. I shall not call it "deceptive" in this instance, because the proposal to offer the amendment was disclosed this noon, and I asked the chairman of the Agriculture Committee to change his position. I understood he canvassed practically all of the members of his committee, and I spoke to most of the members of the Committee on Rules, who agreed with me and the chairman of the Agriculture Committee that it would be unfair to offer the amendment.

Whether or not you agree with the merits of this proposal, in addition to what was represented to the Rules Committee that would be done by this measure, in fairness to the committee and in the spirit of not having a committee misled, this amendment offered by the gentleman should be rejected.

Mr. HOPE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. HOPE. The gentleman, of course, understands that this is not offered now as a committee amendment.

Mr. O'CONNOR. That does not make any difference. That is just an attempt at deception. The gentleman has a perfect right to offer it. I am appealing to the committee that the amendment should be rejected because it is a substantial change in a bill after the bill has been set up and pictured to the Rules Committee.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman mean to say that the House is to accept only the ipse dixit of the Committee on Rules without modification by any germane amendment?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Not at all. Just the opposite. I am talking about fairness. There is no question of the germaneness of this amendment. The question is one of good faith.

Mr. STAFFORD. We knew nothing, when we adopted the rule, as to what assertion was made before the Committee on Rules. The bill is before us for amendment.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Oh, I explained the situation before the rule was adopted.

Mr. MOUSER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. MOUSER. If the gentleman states that this amendment is germane, what is there about the rule which gives the right to amend under the 5-minute rule, that goes beyond the spirit of the bill that was reported?

Mr. O'CONNOR. If this amendment were in the bill in the hearing before the Committee on Rules, it is doubtful if the rule would have been granted, because the question would have arisen, "What have you done to aid the big centers of population?" But the provision to take care of the cities was in the bill. It was, moreover, featured before our committee. I leave it to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] if that was not the situation before our committee.

Mr. MICHENER. As a matter of fact, what the gentleman from New York is complaining about is that when a committee comes before the Rules Committee and asks for a rule to consider a specific bill, it is not fair to the Rules Committee which has considered a given bill, to have the legislative committee at a later date introduce an amendment which is entirely different from the bill contemplated by the rule.

Mr. O'CONNOR. That is exactly what I have in mind. I am not asserting any superior right of the Rules Committee. I am talking about fairness. We never had a rule before us for the consideration of a bill with this amendment.

Mr. BURTNESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. BURTNESS. In the gentleman's reference to what has been done for the cities, surely the gentleman does not take the position that this bill, as it would stand if amended by the Hope amendment, is an agricultural bill or for the benefit of agriculture?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Oh, I heard the gentleman talk about this as a farmers' bill, a farm relief bill. We were always led to believe it was a bill to relieve starvation and distress.

Mr. BURTNESS. Oh, no.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Well, I am shocked; the gentleman now talks about it as a bill for the relief of the farmers. When we voted for the last bill to distribute 40,000,000 bushels of wheat we were told it was a bill to relieve starvation and distress.

Mr. BURTNESS. And so did I.

Mr. O'CONNOR. But the gentleman has been saying it is merely a farm relief bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I do not want to become involved in any controversy over the question of whether or not the spirit of amity that ought to exist between the Committee on Agriculture and the Committee on Rules has been violated in any way. The explanation made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] is the first information I have had as to any special emphasis put upon certain features of this bill before the Committee on Rules, as a reason for or against its being reported.

However, I do not want to become involved in that, but I do want to call attention to the fact that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kansas, instead of broadening the provisions of the bill in any way, rather limits the bill. If the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE] were adopted, it would not be as broad as the original proposition presented to the Committee on Rules, when the rule was filed.

Now, I want to go to the merits of the proposition for a moment and say that I believe this amendment is absolutely essential. I appreciate fully the arguments made by the Representatives from the cities with reference to making the provisions as liberal as possible so that their needy people may be cared for. I am in complete sympathy with that, but I call attention to this proposition, that if this is opened up as wide as the original text provides, I think we are entering upon a very dangerous sort of proceeding. I think we will be establishing a precedent there that will rise to plague us in the days to come. Just as the gentleman from Kansas indicated, if it is proposed that wheat shall be taken and traded for any conceivable proposition that might be brought within the category of food, and it is not limited to the products that come from wheat, it seems to me we are entering upon a very devious and winding path.

Mr. McGUGIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KETCHAM. I yield.

Mr. McGUGIN. As a matter of fact, what they are doing is not providing for the consumption of wheat but providing to use wheat as legal tender.

Mr. KETCHAM. That is it exactly. I have the greatest sympathy for the gentlemen from New York and I would do anything to make the application of this bill as wide as possible, but it seems to me we are going too far.

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KETCHAM. I yield.

Mr. JONES. I talked to the American National Red Cross and they said in any event they would use practically all food made from wheat products, but that these restrictions handicapped them and made them investigate and endeavor to determine. I do not think there is any particular necessity for the amendment. The committee adopted the amendment after we had asked for the rule, and I do not think it is of enough importance to insist upon it.

Mr. KETCHAM. I simply want to say that I would not do anything that would violate in any sense the spirit of agreement that had been reached between the two; but I wanted to take this minute to point out what I deemed to be a dangerous precedent that is being established if we proceed with the bill as it is now written, and permit the Red Cross to trade wheat for any conceivable kind of food products. It seems to me that is an exceedingly dangerous thing.

Mr. CELLER. The gentleman is in error. The American Red Cross has said that they would do no such thing; that there would be very little, comparatively speaking, of this exchanged, and then only where it is absolutely necessary in the terrible situation existing in New York, Chicago, and other large cities.

Mr. SABATH. Where the flour can not be used directly.

Mr. KETCHAM. I only want to say in conclusion that, of course, I am interested in seeing as large a quantity of the wheat used as possible. I do not share the fear other members of the committee have that this is going to work an injustice on the farmers. In my own judgment, if you could get every single bushel of board wheat into the hands of the folks who need but can not buy it, and thus do away with it entirely, it would have a good effect upon the wheat market.

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the substitute amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MOUSER to the Hope substitute amendment: Page 2, line 15, after the word "person," insert a comma and the following: "Provided, That the value of the wheat and cotton to be exchanged shall be determined by the local market value of such wheat and cotton prevailing in the section where the exchange is made."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order the amendment is not germane to the section.

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard briefly on the point of order.

The amendment provides for the exchange of other food products for the cotton and wheat which it to be distributed by the secretary or officials of the Red Cross. If that authority is given to them, certainly it is but logical that we should provide the standard by which the exchange shall be made.

Mr. JONES. I might not have understood the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. MOUSER. It seems to me the chairman of the committee ought to consent to this amendment, since it safeguards the exchange and insures that we get value received for that which we are donating for the benefit of the needy. We want the needy to get the value of this wheat and cotton, and we do not want anybody to manipulate it contrary to their interests. I think this amendment is essential.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I desire to insist on the point of order because the amendment would involve the determination of price, which is not involved in this connection. I think the American Red Cross can be trusted. Therefore I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The question is on the substitute amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HOPE) there were—ayes 23, noes 60.

So the substitute amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FULMER].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FULMER) there were—ayes 36, noes 16.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to go back to section 1 to offer an amendment providing for the use of 100,000 pounds of coffee which the Stabilization Corporation has at the present time. We might as well use this up while we are at it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. In so far as wheat or cotton is donated to relief agencies by the Grain Stabilization Corporation or the Cotton Stabilization Corporation under this resolution the Federal Farm Board is authorized to cancel such part of its loans to such corporation as equals the proportionate part of said loans represented by the wheat or cotton delivered hereunder, less the current market value of the wheat or cotton delivered; and to deduct the amount of such loans canceled from the amount of the revolving fund established by the agricultural marketing act. To carry out the provisions of this resolution, such sums as may be necessary are hereby authorized to be appropriated and made immediately available to the Federal Farm Board to be used solely for the following purposes:

(a) For advancing to such corporations amounts to repay loans held by commercial or intermediate credit banks against wheat or cotton which would be released for donations under this resolution.

(b) For reimbursing each such corporation for its net equity in the wheat or cotton used for donations under this resolution, according to the current market value at the time of the donation.

(c) For meeting carrying and handling charges, and interest payments on commercial or intermediate credit bank loans, on or against wheat and cotton which would be released for donations under this resolution between the date of its approval and the delivery of the wheat or cotton to the American National Red Cross or other organization.

Mr. HART. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HART: Strike out all of section 3 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 3. In so far as wheat or cotton is donated to relief agencies by the Grain Stabilization Corporation or the Cotton Stabilization Corporation under this resolution the Federal Farm Board is authorized to cancel its loans to such corporation.

"To carry out the provisions of this resolution, such sums as may be necessary are hereby authorized to be appropriated and made immediately available to the Federal Farm Board to be used solely for the following purpose, but not in an amount that exceeds the market value of the wheat and cotton:

"For advancing to such corporations amounts to repay loans held by commercial or intermediate credit banks against wheat or cotton which would be released for donations under this resolution."

Mr. HART. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the purposes of this resolution. I subscribe to all the statements made by the two gentlemen from New York and those who are in favor of relieving the needy. I am, however, opposed to section 3 because it provides more relief for the Federal Farm Board and their subsidiaries than it does for the needy. This resolution provides for the sale of 40,000,000 bushels of wheat and 500,000 bales of cotton and permits the Federal Farm Board to name their own price. It is true that it is stated in the language of the resolution that this price is to be the market price, but the Federal Farm Board, under this language, will decide what the market price is.

It is conceded that stabilization has been a failure. I think even its proponents will admit it has been a failure. I think it has been agreed even by the friends of the Federal Farm Board that they are no longer to enter any market in speculation or make any attempt to pile up farm commodities under the stabilization program. Therefore my amendment to this resolution simply provides for an authorization of an appropriation from the Treasury to pay the primary loans upon these two commodities, but it does not authorize the appropriation of one dollar from the Treasury to pay any equities which the Farm Board or any of their agencies may claim in this cotton or wheat.

If we adopt the language of this resolution, here is what we will do: First, we will take this cotton and wheat off the Farm Board's hands at their own price. We will pay them a price at which we could go out in the open markets of the country and buy these commodities. We are going to injure the farmers of these two commodities. There is no question about that. I am a large grower of wheat and have a good many thousand bushels of wheat upon my farm now unsold, yet I am in favor of this measure, but I do not desire to take money out of the Treasury in order to rehabilitate this institution, which has done untold damage to the farmers. I am in favor of distributing this wheat and cotton and getting it off the market. It has been a bad deal for the farmer and he must expect to suffer. I expect to take my part of the damage. All farmers throughout Michigan, I am sure, would subscribe to that. They understand that this stuff is hanging over the market and the sooner we get rid of it the sooner we are going to get better prices. On the other hand, I do not think they would subscribe to an appropriation from the Treasury which would increase this revolving fund for the purpose of going back into the market and creating the same situation from which we are now trying to relieve ourselves.

For that reason I have offered this amendment. It simply takes away this wheat and cotton from the Farm Board, pays the primary loans against them which they have borrowed from the intermediate credit banks and private banks but does not reimburse the Federal Farm Board for any equities they may have in it.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman yield in order that I may make a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. BURTNESS. Yes.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes, 3 minutes to be allotted to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SUMMERS] and 2 minutes to myself.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, I am in general agreement with the purpose of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HART]. The only trouble with his amendment is that it is meaningless, for his language does not in any way change the construction that must be placed upon the original language in the resolution itself. All the resolution provides as to reimbursement is the very thing which the gentleman from Michigan argues for, to wit, the payment of liens against the wheat or cotton.

I do not know whether I can be quite as liberal as is the gentleman from Michigan to burden the wheat farmers of this country with the relief that is carried in this resolution. I intended to support this resolution when I came over here this afternoon. I assumed at that time that it was similar to the one passed some months ago. Also I agree with others that whenever the surplus that has been piled up in the show cases of the Stabilization Corporation can be eliminated both the producers and consumers of this country will be better off. I gladly join in relief for those in distress by providing wheat for food. But under the language of this resolution, as it now stands, and with the committee having refused to accept the Hope amendment, let us see what it actually proposes to do. As I construe it, the title thereof might well be substantially this:

To give relief to distressed people in the Nation at the expense of the wheat farmers thereof.

Possibly to that ought to be added the cotton farmers. I am not so sure, however, as to that because it may be that the Fulmer amendment has taken care of it so that it will not be at the expense of the cotton farmer. However, I am not certain, and I suggest the cotton representatives ought to look into that phase of it.

Let us, however, see what it does with reference to wheat. It says substantially this: We will donate 40,000,000 bushels of wheat to the Red Cross for the relief of those in distress. But what will the Red Cross do with it? That organization first arranges to grind it into flour on a sort of share basis.

The millers will retain a portion of it. I do not know whether the portion retained amounts to one-fourth or one-fifth or some other fraction, but a certain amount of it is retained in the hands of the miller to cover the cost of grinding. What happens because of that fact? Why, of course, it decreases to that extent the demand for wheat on the part of the millers. There can be no question about that. It also means that to the extent that consumption demand is met the market for flour is lessened.

Then, under the language of this bill, what further do you propose? You say, "Yes; you may take this wheat or the flour produced from the wheat turned over to the Red Cross and exchange it in turn for any other food that is needed." What will happen to that flour that is exchanged for other kinds of food? Why, of course, it stays in some grocery store and then enters into the competitive market. It will be sold to people who would otherwise buy and pay for flour produced from grain entering the market in the usual way, and you are proposing to do this now, at the beginning of a new marketing season, when the wheat crop from the Southwest will soon go upon the market, and the authority will continue throughout the marketing season. Do you wonder at my concern?

I see most of the men from the wheat States here ready to support this bill, just as I was ready to support it a few moments ago. If these provisions remain in the bill, as one representing one of the largest wheat districts in this country, I can not go back to my people and meet the charge that will be made and admit that I was willing to vote funds or property to relieve the distress of the people in the cities but that I did so at the expense of the wheat farmers of this country. Let us perfect it so as to carry out its laudable intent, but in such a way as not to reduce further the market price of wheat which is now way below the cost of production. [Applause.]

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, ancient Rome is said to have won her battles, conquered her enemies, and grown great on a ration of unground wheat. But I am persuaded that the simple, invigorating ration of whole wheat that vitalized the Roman soldier is not generally known to individuals and relief agencies to-day.

Well-cooked unground wheat is an ideal human food. It is loaded with calories, vitamins, and other essential elements. It is a rich, nourishing food available for all. At my own table we and our guests think the flavor equals or surpasses most breakfast foods now offered. In food value it undoubtedly surpasses them all. Could it be commercialized and sold in fancy cartons by the ounce instead of by the bushel, millions would demand it, as they now do tomato juice, which was for ages a waste product. Certainly no man, woman, or child in America need suffer hunger while our wheat bins are bulging.

We process wheat to meet the cultivated demands of modern civilization. With every refinement we reduce its food value.

WHAT'S IN A WHOLE GRAIN OF WHEAT?

A food chemist tells us it contains, before the outer covering or "bran" is removed: Iron, for rich blood and rosy cheeks; fluorine, for clear vision and bright eyes, but especially for the armorplate enamel that protects the teeth from decay; calcium, for sound teeth, good digestion, and strong bones; silicon, for the nerves and luxuriant hair; phosphorus, that repairs and builds nerve tissue; potassium, that keeps the tissues young and elastic; sodium, that destroys poisons and is absolutely essential to health; magnesium, that combines with phosphorus, silicon, and fluorine to develop teeth and bones; sulphur, that works with silicon to make fine hair and nails that will not break; iodine, that defends the body against disease; manganese, that works with iron to keep the healthy red in the blood and to burn up poisons dangerous to the body; chlorine, that helps to make up the gastric juice, and without which there can be no "good digestion"; oxygen, nitrogen, hydrogen, and carbon, which make breathing. These 16 elements that make for the joy of living are all found in wheat.

To Mrs. Congressman James V. McClintic of Oklahoma, to Mrs. Summers, and to Mrs. Fred Rogers, of Colfax, Wash., we are indebted for the following recipes that have found favor in official Washington and elsewhere.

WHOLE WHEAT

Mrs. Summers suggests that 2 quarts of whole wheat be well washed with hot water and soaked for 12 to 24 hours. Place in a double boiler. Add water as needed. Cook three hours over a slow fire. Salt to taste while cooking. Serve hot or cold with milk, or with cream and sugar. Keep unused portion in refrigerator and serve cold or reheat from day to day as used. Reheating improves the flavor which may be changed at time of serving by the addition of any available fruit juice.

But wheat should not be considered a "breakfast food" only. With side dishes of cabbage, lettuce, or other green vegetables and whatever fruits may be available it becomes the base of a well-balanced ration for the heavy meals of the day. A noted food specialist of New York asserts that the brain worker or laboring man will maintain health, strength, and bodily vigor indefinitely on a wheat ration. As a physician myself I commend its wider use.

The criticism that it requires long cooking is overcome by cooking a sufficient quantity for several days' use at one time. Anyone who has two pans may improvise a double boiler by placing a thin strip of wood in the outer pan partly filled with water.

CHILI WHEAT

Mrs. Roger's favorite recipe is approximately as follows: Two pints well-cooked wheat, 2 tablespoons suet, 1 medium-sized chopped onion, ½ pound hamburger, ½ pint chopped celery, 1 small can tomatoes. Season. Bake in oven.

This is a delicious preparation that should tickle the palate of the most fastidious epicure. Unused portions may be fried like meat or potato balls.

To Mrs. McClintic, however, we are indebted for all the original and compiled wheat recipes that follow. She has popularized the use of unground wheat in Oklahoma and in the National Capital and is entitled to much credit.

ALL THE RECIPES CALL FOR COOKED WHEAT

Sort the wheat grains and wash thoroughly. Soak over night or allow a longer period of time for cooking. For each cup of wheat add 2 cups of water. Put on a very low fire in a tightly closed vessel on an asbestos mat. Cook slowly as possible for five or six hours; that is, until the grains are plump to the bursting point. Add 1 teaspoonful of salt for each cupful when wheat is fairly well done.

COFFEE SUBSTITUTE

When wheat is about half cooked, pour off liquid and serve with sugar and cream.

WHOLE GRAIN WHEAT GRIDDLE CAKES

One cup flour, 1 cup milk, 1 egg, 2 tablespoons fat, 2 teaspoons baking powder, one-half cup whole cooked wheat.

WHOLE-WHEAT MUFFINS

One cup sifted flour, one-half teaspoon salt, 1 cup cooked wheat, 1 egg, 2 teaspoons baking powder, one-half cup milk, 1 tablespoon melted fat.

Sift dry ingredients together, add the wheat, and mix thoroughly. Beat the egg, add the milk, stir into the dry ingredients. Bake in moderate oven about 30 minutes. Makes eight large muffins.

WHOLE WHEAT EXCELLENT SUBSTITUTE FOR NUTS

In substituting wheat for nuts, be sure to use the cake, cookies, or muffins the day they are baked. The wheat becomes hard within a few hours.

Use whole wheat with bacon, onions, and scrambled eggs.

WHOLE-WHEAT CHOWDER

Two cups diced carrots, 1 pint boiling water, one-half cup diced salt pork, 4 tablespoons chopped onions, 1 tablespoon flour, 1 pint milk, 2 cups cooked whole wheat, 1 teaspoon salt, pepper.

Cook the carrots in the boiling water until tender. Fry the salt pork until crisp, remove it from the fat, and cook the onions in the fat. Stir in the flour and cook a few minutes longer. Mix all ingredients in the upper part of a double boiler, stir until well blended, and cook about 10 minutes.

This chowder, with the addition of a raw salad or fresh fruit, makes a delicious and nourishing meal.

WHOLE-WHEAT MEAT LOAF

One cup cooked whole wheat, 1 medium-sized onion finely chopped, 1 cup ground or finely chopped meat, 1 egg, beaten.

Mix the ingredients, mold into a loaf, and bake in a moderate oven.

WHOLE-WHEAT PUDDING

Two cups hot milk, 2 cups cooked whole wheat, 1 egg, 2 tablespoons sugar, 1 cup chopped seeded raisins, three-fourths teaspoon salt, one-half teaspoon vanilla.

Mix the wheat, milk, salt, and sugar. Add the raisins, beaten egg, and the vanilla. Pour into baking dish and bake in a moderate oven about 30 minutes or until set. Chill before serving.

WHOLE WHEAT COOKIES

Three-fourths cup sifted flour, one-half teaspoon salt, 1 teaspoon cinnamon, one-half teaspoon soda, 2 tablespoons fat, one-half cup sugar, 1 egg, 1 cup cooked whole wheat, 1 cup seedless raisins.

Sift the dry ingredients together, except the sugar, add the fat, sugar, beaten egg, wheat, and raisins. Stir until well mixed. Drop by teaspoonfuls on a greased pan about 2 inches apart, and bake in a moderate oven until lightly browned.

COOKING THE GROUND WHOLE WHEAT

One cup of ground, whole wheat is added slowly to three cups of boiling water, to which has been added three-fourths teaspoon salt, and cook for one hour. The cooked cereal may be used in soups and stews to thicken.

Whole wheat makes "a dinner fit for a king." Its use may well extend from the farm where it is grown to city dwellers everywhere.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. Chairman, I was in sympathy with the bill which provided for giving away 40,000,000 bushels of wheat. I had my doubts then if it was for the best interests of the wheat section, but tried to view the matter in the light of the best interests of the Nation as a whole.

It does seem to me that Wall Street and Michigan Boulevard should be able to feed their own poor, but maybe they can not. We who come from the Wheat Belt have made the concession of permitting wheat to be given away, but this is carrying it far enough.

Let us see what Government monkeying in the farm business has done to this country.

In the first place, you gave the farmers a farm bill they did not want. The Farm Board, we say, has wrecked the market, and now comes Congress and does worse. Here is what you are doing for wheat—not the Farm Board but Congress: In the first place, you are saying to the Farm Board, "Give it away; it is not worth selling." The Farm Board gives it to the Red Cross, which gets it for nothing. The Red Cross says, "It is not worth keeping," and trades it for vinegar, salt, pepper, or what not."

When the Government does this is there any wonder that the wheat market is down to nothing? This is an outrage upon the wheat industry of this country.

I say to my friends from the South an amendment was put on here that cotton could not be used in exchange except for cotton goods; but you desert wheat and provide that wheat can be used as legal tender to be traded for chips and whetstones. Talk about fiat money; I would rather have fiat money than to have this wrong perpetrated upon the wheat industry of this country.

We do strenuously object to throwing wheat on the public to be used as a means of barter and trade. What has this session of Congress done for the farmer? I am not condemning Congress for that, for I do not know that there is anything that can be done for the immediate benefit of agriculture, but Congress can refrain from magnifying the present sad plight of agriculture. If we can not do anything for agriculture, let us not make it any worse. Let no man rise and condemn the Farm Board if Congress is going to give wheat to the Red Cross with instructions to trade it for other goods. I am willing to go along, give wheat to those in distress—but I am not willing to do it at the expense of agriculture, by letting the Red Cross trade the wheat for groceries other than groceries made from wheat. If wheat is to be given away the farmers of America are entitled to benefit to the extent of knowing that the wheat is being consumed.

I did not want to move to strike out the enacting clause, but you have left the bill in such shape that it can not be enacted without crucifying the farmers of this country. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I think my friend from Kansas is unduly exercised, and he made some statements that I am sure he did not mean.

In the first place, one would infer from his statement that it would be all right for a man to starve if he was in New York. I want to say that I do not want any man or woman to starve anywhere under the American flag. [Applause.]

We have the statement from the American National Red Cross that in the handling of this commodity practically all the wheat that is exchanged will be exchanged for commodities, of which wheat is a component part. There are scores of articles of food in the preparation of which wheat is used.

Under the terms, however, of the gentleman's amendment, it will be necessary for the American National Red Cross to analyze, to see how much flour there is in the food products. The Red Cross can be trusted to handle it. They have done wonderful work so far. There has never been a time in the history of the American Government when this relief was more important and more needed, and because, forsooth there may be one or two little food commodities not made from wheat that might creep in, the gentleman would by his motion deny the people of this country the right to feed the hungry people 40,000,000 bushels of wheat and the naked the right to be clothed from the cotton. Does he want the wheat to rot in the bins? Would he want these commodities to eat themselves up in storage charges merely because the bill is not worded just as he wishes it?

What a strange and cruel philosophy! Men from the wheat sections seriously contending that because a small amount of this wheat might be used to procure other commodities, the enacting clause should be stricken out. I wish and expect that practically all this wheat will be used for food commodities made of wheat. I believe the Red Cross will see to this. They have assured us they will. I have an admiration for the gentleman from Kansas. I like his candor. I like his courage. I feel that after reflecting he will not want his motion adopted by the House. I believe the farmers in this country will be better off when the wheat and cotton in this resolution are given to the people who need it. [Applause.]

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. McGUGIN. Why is it necessary to provide in this bill that cotton must be used exclusively in exchange for cotton goods? Why did you not leave cotton to be bartered off for knick-knacks, peanuts, and so forth.

Mr. JONES. It is not necessary. I do not believe the Red Cross would so trade it even if that amendment were not in.

Mr. McGUGIN. Give us some kind of similar protection in an amendment for wheat. I would have no objection to the bill then.

Mr. JONES. That is the gentleman's opinion, and I am sorry for it. I am sorry he takes that view, but I believe he is wrong. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired on this section and all amendments thereto.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Has time expired upon the motion to strike out the enacting clause?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. All time has expired. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Kansas that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs upon the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. The Federal Farm Board shall execute its functions under this resolution through its usual administrative staff and such additional clerical assistance as may be found necessary, without additional appropriations beyond its usual administrative appropriation under the agricultural marketing act.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In view of the attitude taken by the members of the committee and of the House from those sections of the country where the wheat is being produced, I have risen at this moment for the purpose of suggesting that the friends of this measure—and I assume that we are all friends of the measure—find some way of meeting the objections that have been made by way of a motion to recommit. We did adopt an amendment under which cotton producers are protected against the exchange of cotton for any other textile except that manufactured from cotton.

Mr. FULMER. I will state for the information of the gentleman that we passed a bill some time ago appropriating 40,000,000 bushels of wheat, and we have only about 100,000,000 bushels of wheat on hand. To-day the cotton people of the South, in connection with the Government, have some 13,000,000 bales of cotton, and this is the first time that cotton has been appropriated.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, no; it is 1,000,000 bales.

Mr. FULMER. This is the first time that we have asked anything of the kind.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I am not objecting to the amendment that was adopted with reference to cotton, but I do think it would be possible to frame a motion to recommit which would give similar treatment to wheat that might be exchanged for food products very largely made from wheat.

Mr. LARSEN. Every member of this committee on the Democratic side voted for the Hope amendment, except two. Do not try to kill the bill. We have done the best that we could.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. It is not my purpose at all to endeavor to kill the bill. I am trying to rescue the bill, because if you get the opposition of the entire wheat-growing sections of the country to the bill, when we are trying to dispose of wheat by it, I do not think that we will be in a very favorable position, so far as passing the bill is concerned. I hope a way out may be found.

I call attention to the amendment that was adopted with reference to cotton. It reads:

Cotton may be manufactured into cloth or wearing apparel or exchanged for other articles of clothing made of cloth.

Let us give like treatment to wheat.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. I am very much in favor of this bill, and may I call the attention of the House at this time to one direct result of this kind of legislation. To-day I talked with a representative of Bernarr MacFadden, of New York City, the noted publisher of Liberty and other magazines. Mr. MacFadden is a real philanthropist, who has the interest of the poor and the needy at heart. This man feeds 6,000 people a day free in New York City, I think, at a cost of 5 cents per person, and gives them a good decent meal. He has sent his representative down here to-day. His representative came to me to ask my help as to how he could be of service in helping to feed the men of the Bonus Expeditionary Force. I assisted him and his associate, Mrs. Lumsden, in contacting the Red Cross. They are going to get wheat from the Red Cross under the provisions of the previous bill which was passed by Congress.

This man will put soup kitchens out there for these 18,000 men of the Bonus Expeditionary Force, and show them how to take that wheat, make it into porridge as he is doing it in New York; and he will give them coffee in addition. He is doing a wonderful thing for those 18,000 men who are out there without shelter—ex-service men who should at least be getting bed sacks and tents from the War Department and are not getting them. I am not talking bonus to you. I am just talking about the plain effect of the legislation which we have already passed. We know what it has done to help those in need and I hope this bill will pass to-day.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. Chairman, we are here to legislate for the whole country, and if there is any one man on this floor that has sought to bring about a better understanding between the workers of the cities and the farmers, I have done that in every instance.

New York State and New York City have paid for their share of this wheat. It is impossible to brush aside 6,000,000 people. New York has repeatedly voted for farm relief in every shape and form, whether it was in the drought area, whether it was for the corn borer, or whether it was the Haugen bill or other bills that came up long before some of the gentlemen now opposing this bill were Members of this body.

Mr. KNUTSON. Not the grasshoppers, though.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Well, that is coming back, and we will help you on that.

Now, I want to say to the gentlemen from the Wheat Belt that we should stand together. The wheat here provided will be consumed in a few weeks. Far better to consume it than have it there as a constant threat to prices. The distress is not local. This distress is all over the United States. Twenty-five per cent of this is going for feed for your own livestock.

Mr. FULMER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. FULMER. I appreciate the statement which the gentleman made a while ago about trying to be helpful to the agricultural interests of this country. In a great many instances the gentleman from New York has tried to be helpful to me in passing legislation that I know is of deep interest to my people of the South. [Applause.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Thanks. It is gratifying to hear that one's sincere efforts are appreciated.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Many of the largest agricultural measures which have passed in this House were passed by the votes of New York City.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is absolutely correct. In addition to record votes, many were the teller votes on behalf of the farmers saved by the votes of New York City Members.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close. Is there objection?

Mr. BURTNESS. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] yield to this suggestion: That this matter be left open until to-morrow, in so far as final action with reference to a motion to recommit is concerned?

Mr. JONES. We can correct it in conference if there is any mistake.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. BURTNESS. I object.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the committee rises automatically.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. RAINEY] having resumed the chair, Mr. WOODRUM, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration House Joint Resolution 418, and, pursuant to House Resolution 261, he reported the same back to the House with an amendment adopted by the committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule the previous question is ordered on the joint resolution to final passage.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en grosse.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Speaker, I demand the reading of the engrossed copy.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on ordering the engrossed copy.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Speaker, I made a demand for the reading of the engrossed copy, and as a Member of the House I am entitled to it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Speaker, I demand the reading of the engrossed copy.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me this is dilatory action upon the part of the gentleman from North Dakota.

Mr. HOCH. The gentleman is within his rights.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman is within his rights, but the House evidently desires to pass this bill, and if the House will join with those who are in favor of the passage of the bill to-night, we will pass it, because we can secure the engrossed copy within 10 or 15 minutes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I call up the resolution (H. Res. 250).

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from North Dakota insist on the reading of the engrossed bill?

Mr. BURTNESS. I simply want to say we representing wheat sections are confronted here with a situation that may seriously affect the wheat market. Under the policy of the Farm Board they are selling not more than 5,000,000 bushels of wheat per month in the domestic market in order to protect the price of wheat. That is the theory of the limitation.

Suddenly we are confronted with a proposal to release 40,000,000 bushels of wheat on the market at this time or within a few months. Some of us are interested in giving additional thought and consideration to this question to determine whether or not a motion to recommit should be offered, and what provisions should be included in such motion to recommit, if we decide to offer one.

In view of the complex situation I believe we ought to be granted a little time to consider it. Obviously, we can not prepare a well-considered motion to recommit in a hurry, in just a few seconds.

I hate to tie up the House in any way, but it is now past the usual time of adjournment and I wish some agreement could be made so that the matter may go over until to-morrow.

The regular order was demanded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman insist on the reading of the engrossed copy of the bill?

Mr. BURTNESS. It depends on the attitude of the chairman of the committee. I would like to consult him.

Mr. FULMER. I may state to the gentleman that I voted for his amendment. The gentleman will have an opportunity to fix the matter in the Senate.

Mr. JONES. I may say to the gentleman that if this bill is passed we may get some sort of an agreement about withholding this wheat from the market.

Mr. BURTNESS. It is ridiculous to throw 40,000,000 bushels of wheat on the market and then talk about an agreement to withhold it.

Mr. JONES. This is not throwing it on the market.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman insist on the reading of the engrossed copy?

Mr. BURTNESS. I insist.

Mr. BANKHEAD and Mr. BLACK demanded the regular order.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my request that the engrossed bill be read, inasmuch as the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE] has a motion to recommit ready.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I submit a motion to recommit the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. HOPE. I am; in its present form.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HOPE moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Agriculture with instructions to report the same back forthwith with the following amendment: Page 2, strike out beginning with line 11 down through line 16 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"In order to carry out the purposes of this resolution such wheat, or the products thereof, may be milled, processed, or manufactured into, or exchanged for, flour of any kind, bread, or other food or feed of which wheat, or any by-product thereof, is a substantial ingredient, and such cotton may be processed or manufactured into, or exchanged for, cloth and wearing apparel, made of cotton, but such milling, processing, or manufacturing shall be without profit to any mill, organization, or other person. So far as necessary, such wheat and cotton, and the products thereof, may be used in meeting transportation, storage, and handling expenses in carrying out the purposes of this resolution."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order the motion to recommit is not in order, because the committee has just declined to accept an amendment substantially the same as the motion to recommit now submitted by the gentleman from Kansas.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HOPE) there were—ayes 34, noes 87.

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground there is no quorum present.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, if the House should adjourn now this would be the first thing in order in the morning, would it not?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The call is automatic.

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's request comes too late. The Chair has announced that a quorum is not present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 63, nays 188, answered "present" 1, not voting 178, as follows:

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD on the 2-headed Janus Ohio plan prohibition plank of the Republican platform.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not ever object to my friend's extensions, I want to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin what he thinks about that Republican gag-rule convention, where SNELL sergeants at arms forcibly captured Senator France and kidnaped him, when he tried to nominate Coolidge.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to—

Mr. KELLER, for time to go to Denver and return, on account of continued illness of his wife.

Mr. MAY, indefinitely, on account of important business.

SOME FACTS FROM THE RECORD

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD on my work for economy and efficiency in the administration of government.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I believe that a brief review of some of the highest spots of my 11 years of service in this House may be generally useful, and certainly will be interesting to my constituents.

I have scrupulously attended all sessions of the House. I have been on hand the first day, and through all these years have remained on hand until the last minute of the last day. I have missed, during the 11 years, very few roll calls, and then only when more important official business carried me elsewhere or when sick. Some few times, while in special executive session of the committee and also while attending to some departmental matter for a constituent, I missed unimportant roll calls. But, upon every important issue before the Congress during the 11 years I have insisted upon being recorded. When, upon some matters, there was not any aye-and-nay vote, I made the RECORD show otherwise just where I stood. I hold it to be the duty of any American Representative to stand out where the people can see and understand his official attitude.

OPPOSED SALARY RAISES

For example, when, a few years ago the salaries were increased, some of us demanded a roll call and, while under the rules of the House we did not get a sufficient number to obtain a roll call, I made the RECORD show, and it still shows, that I opposed and protested against such raise and the method employed to do it.

I have taken my official duties seriously. It is my motto that "The public business is my business." When I was elected to Congress I gave up my law business entirely and have engaged in a very few cases since. I insisted upon devoting my entire time and strength, even during vacation, to try in some way to serve and work for the people. I have worked for them upon an average of 12 or 15 hours a day, both while in Washington and while at home even during a recess of Congress.

I have answered all letters promptly and to the very best of my ability. I have tried to meet the various wants, needs, and wishes of individual constituents. I have not only devoted my time and strength but my secret thought and sympathy to seeking how to serve the people.

STAND FOR CLEAN GOVERNMENT

I have sought in every way to promote honest Government, economical administration, and a fair and efficient performance of public duty. I have set my face sternly against every form of graft and grafter. In all cases I have been harsh and severe with the corrupt public officials. I have not failed to offer my criticism of the lax and careless public officer. The man who does his duty along these lines will make enemies, and naturally I have accumulated a good crop of them around Washington.

I believe that it is a fairly safe rule to say that the Congressman who is popular with the social and official and business public in Washington is not doing his whole duty by his constitutents back home and his country. It was Woodrow Wilson who said that he had to leave Washington in order to find out what the people felt and thought. There is a false public opinion about Washington, built up largely by those who are upon the public pay rolls, and by those who live by selling to, and serving, Government clerks. They do not understand nor sympathize with the millions of struggling, suffering masses of taxpayers throughout the land.

I have kept my mind upon the condition of the country at large, and especially upon the people struggling for existence, and to preserve their homes, in the district that has intrusted me with this office. I have tried to act upon the principle that a public office is a public trust, and to be trusted by one's fellow citizens with the high call of Representative in the National Government has been accepted by me as a great and serious responsibility. I would feel ashamed to face my friends and neighbors if I failed to take this work seriously. And especially so in this sad crisis in our Nation's history. My sole thought is how best to serve, in my humble way, the land and people I love.

FIGHTS WAR PROFITEERS

I came to Congress with a deep-seated hatred for every person who would make profit out of his country's necessities, woes, and miseries during war. It was found that about 23,000 persons had become millionaires as a result of war profits, and those who were already millionaires, had been made multimillionaires by the mounting profits of war time.

On December 8, 1922, I offered the first resolution ever offered in Congress to set up a commission to study this huge problem and to devise ways and means to prevent its repetition in the future. Various other bills were pushed to the front by the American Legion, but failed, and finally the American Legion got behind my resolution, and it was taken up by such administration leaders as Representative SNELL, of New York, and Senator REED, of Pennsylvania, and as a result, after years of work and struggle, a joint resolution was passed, and approved by the President, who gave me one of the pens with which he signed his name on the bill.

MEMBER OF WAR POLICIES COMMISSION

I was appointed by the Speaker one of this body, known as the War Policies Commission, and we were holding daily hearings, investigating the facts, when, on March 17, 1931, I was suddenly stricken ill. But even as I lay helpless in the hospital, unable to raise my head, I called stenographers to the bedside frequently and dictated my thoughts and plans and suggestions for guiding the work of the commission, and as soon as I was able to hobble on my feet I was back at the work again. We found the startling fact that about one-half of the $39,000,000,000 raised and spent by this Government to conduct the war could have been saved if profiteering had been prevented in time, and if prices had been held down to a normal average.

We finally agreed upon a report and submitted the same to Congress, and constitutional amendments are now pending to give the Congress power, in the event of a future war, so to regulate prices that war burdens will be equalized, profiteering prevented, and every citizen contribute, as nearly as possible, his or her part to the conduct of a war which is the business of the whole Nation.

THOSE EUROPEAN WAR DEBTS

I hope that it may be a long time before we have another war. I am sure that it will be a very long time before we finish paying the debts and discharging the obligations of the last war. The hundreds of thousands of wounded and disabled, and the millions of sick, will be with us for at least another generation. Already European nations have practically served notice that they will pay no more on their debts to us. Big international and investment bankers are advocating the cancellation of these war debts. They have foolishly lent money to these European countries, and think that if our Government collects what is due it they may not be able to collect what these European nations owe these big bankers.

But I am for holding their feet to the fire. I never voted for a single settlement of these war debts, except that of little Belgium. If they never pay, we will always know they owe it, and maybe, at some future turn in world affairs, America may gain proper advantage by being able to step up and say: "You fellows owe us these billions of dollars, and now is your time to settle."

But war comes like a thief in the night. We must keep prepared. Especially must our civilian forces, such as National Guard and Organized Reserves, be maintained. I am supporting pending bills to develop and strengthen these forces.

WORK FOR THE FARMERS

Now for my record as to agriculture.

It seems unnecessary to offer any proof of my deep interest in agriculture and of my efforts to promote the well-being of the farmers and of the farmers' families. I know that the foundation of all national prosperity is ultimately based upon the soil. Hence I have taken advantage of every opportunity to promote farm life and all rural institutions serving farm life. I made a trip to Denmark at my own expense to study at first hand their marvelous system of crop production and of cooperative marketing, about which I had been reading for many years. As a result of my studies there I came to the definite conclusion that we must establish farm-demonstration counties, by the aid of both Federal and State Governments, in order to show how communities may be transformed from 1-crop poverty to diversified prosperity through the application of approved and progressive methods.

To that end I introduced H. R. 12481 in the Seventy-first Congress and have done a great deal of work in calling that proposition to the attention of other Members of Congress and of farm leaders outside of Congress, and was meeting with great encouragement when the severity of the depression struck everything with paralysis.

I never lost an opportunity in speaking to Rotary, Kiwanis, Civitan, Lions, and Monarch Clubs to urge my business friends living in cities and industrial districts to recognize that their well-being is wrapped up with the success of farmers. This was my favorite theme. Along this line my mind constantly ran. It was a joy, and not a burden, to work and plan for the improvement of farm conditions. I was one of the three Representatives from South Carolina who voted for the famous McNary-Haugen farm relief bill in 1926. That measure was denounced by the then Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Hoover, as "unsound economically," and that phrase was picked up, and carried around to the ultimate defeat of the bill. If it had become law, the farmers would not have been in the terrible plight they are now in, and the Treasury would have been at least $500,000,000 better off, wasted by the Federal Farm Board.

It was up to candidate Hoover, in 1928, to suggest some solution of farm difficulties that would be economically sound, and so he stumbled upon his stabilization system, which was enacted into law, under his administration, as the Federal Farm Board. It is idle to try to characterize in words the huge mistake then and there made. It has done some good, but much harm.

For several years friends in different parts of the State had been suggesting that I offer myself for the United States Senate. I had never encouraged the matter, by either word or deed, because I was happy in my work in the House. During 1930 I had spoken on the platform several times with Dr. William Weston in seeking to impress our farmers with the necessity for gradually changing over from cotton to diversified food crops, and milk products. The possibilities of good for our whole State along this line seemed to be enormous. The prospects fired my imagination and stimulated my enthusiasm. Many of the people of the State interpreted this interest and activity to signify political ambition, and the inquiries became so frequent and insistent that early in January, 1931, I issued the following statement, which was carried either in whole or in part by most of the papers in the State:

Friends have frequently asked me if I am a candidate for the United States Senate.

I have invariably answered in the negative. I am more interested in service than in promotion in officeholding. I wish to assist in the campaign to rehabilitate South Carolina economically by building up a balanced, diversified agriculture. The 1-crop system must end if we are ever to recover. We must not only produce all food and feed crops for home and farm consumption but we must begin to sell other things in addition to cotton. Our fruits and vegetables, when canned, will be greedily purchased at top prices in the big city markets North and East. Also such milk and meat products as we are so fortunately situated to produce economically and in abundance will sell quickly. I stand for more sane and sound business leadership and for less petty and partisan political agitation. Our leaders must frankly tell our people the truth and earnestly help to set agriculture upon a stable, self-sustaining, and profit-making basis in South Carolina, and thus insure a reasonable degree of prosperity to country, town, and city, and to all business and industrial groups in the State.

If, therefore, I joined in the movement to help others to lead South Carolina out of her present distress, while at the same time a candidate for the Senate, my motives would be questioned and the benefits of any services discounted. Let us all plan and work together to upbuild South Carolina.

I had fondly planned to enter vigorously upon this work of arousing and organizing our people, both country and city, to the great plan of reconstructing our agricultural system, when, on March 17, 1931, I was struck suddenly by illness, from which I lingered months in the hospital and later at my apartment, and did not put my foot in my office until the first Monday in December, 1931. However, during all those months of suffering and of patient effort to regain health and strength my mind dwelt upon this theme of helping our whole people by constructive and unselfish leadership. My thanksgiving reflections took this same turn, and being committed to writing, they were published in the Greenville News of December 2, 1931. I had many letters from over the State thanking me for that article.

TRYING TO SAVE FARMS FROM SALE

Realizing the sad condition of thousands and thousands of individual farmers, due to the fact that they were unable to pay their annual installments on their mortgage loans from the Federal land banks and the joint-stock land banks, on January 4, 1932, I introduced in the House H. R. 6989, for the creation of a Federal farm-loan trust to take over all defaulted mortgage loans, to refinance the same for 50 years at 4 per cent interest, and to give the original borrower, where land has been sold under foreclosure, an option to repurchase his former home at the face of the mortgage debt, with costs, and to give him, also, 50 years at 4 per cent interest. It was further provided that no foreclosure proceedings should be had until six months after default and no land be sold until one year after default.

CHEAPER FERTILIZERS

I have also during the last 10 years worked hard to demonstrate that it is possible to supply the farmers with a better grade of fertilizer at lower prices per unit of plant food, and for that reason I have taken a deep interest in the Muscle Shoals project. I am opposed to Government in business, and prefer a lease for that property; but, if no one will lease it, I am in favor of using it to demonstrate the feasibility of producing cheap nitrogen from the air. Chile has had a monopoly of mineral nitrogen for nearly 100 years. During that time she has forced the world to pay more than one-half of all her taxes by imposing an export duty on nitrate of soda. The nitrate of soda exported to the United States, and used by our farmers on their crops, has contributed to the treasury of the Chilean Government about $200,000,000 in such export duty. The private manufacturers of nitrogen naturally take advantage of the price of Chilean nitrates as a standard of prices. I believe that a lease can finally be obtained for that property whereby the lessee will produce high-grade concentrated nitrate of soda at little more than half what we have been paying for it on all markets generally since the war, and perhaps this nitrogen can be combined with phosphoric acid at the same place, so as to produce an almost complete fertilizer at an enormous reduction in costs. That is the reason why I have devoted so much of my work in Congress to this Muscle Shoals proposition.

BETTER PRICES, NOT MORE BORROWINGS, NEED OF FARMERS

But I realize that the fundamental problem for the American farmer, and the American business man, and the American laborer is the money problem. Following the most stupendous period of speculation in the history of the world, which ended in tragic collapse in October, 1929, there has been a contraction of money in circulation, both by hoarding and by the calling of loans, and the refusal to make new loans whereby the relative value of actual cash has been enhanced two, three, and sometimes four times its normal value in terms of commodities produced by the farmer, the manufacturer, and the laborer. Debts contracted upon this basis can not be paid under the present circumstances, and the only relief against this distressing situation is by a deliberate and intentional expansion and increase of the volume of currency, through employing the instrumentality of the Federal reserve system, so that it may accomplish the purpose for which it was set up, to wit, to stabilize the market value of commodities, of property, and of labor by increasing or decreasing the volume of currency as conditions may demand, so that the prices may remain uniform.

If we will do this we can restore to the price level of 1926 all such commodities as cotton, corn, wheat, milk, and meat products, and by the use of the Federal reserve system can stabilize those prices so that the farmers will know, when they plant within reasonable limits, what their crops will bring when harvested and the manufacturers will know when they buy raw materials, within reasonable limits, what their products will sell for, and the whole economic structure will thus be rendered healthy and dependable. These cycles of successive prosperity and of depression, these deceptive periods of speculation, followed by the misery and woe of depression, would then disappear. Here is the seat of all our trouble, and this remedy must be applied before we can recover, and this system must be constantly employed in order to insure steady employment for labor, fair prices for farm products, fairly uniform values for property generally, continuity in business, so that bank failures may disappear and the whole country go forward with confidence and continue to work and to produce with a sense of safety.

SUPPORTS GENERAL ACCOUNTING OFFICE

Frequently bills have come before the Committee on Military Affairs relating to some activity of the War Department, and almost concealed therein would be a provision exempting the War Department, in certain respects, at least, from having its vouchers and accounts audited by the Comptroller General of the Treasury.

This very useful and necessary public officer is roundly hated by the personnel of the Army and the Navy. I also believe that the bureau chiefs and permanent personnel of most other Government departments hate this office of Comptroller General of the Treasury. He checks their accounts and will not let them pay out money unless specifically authorized by Congress. Many of their favorite schemes and extravagant plans and projects have been prevented by the close checking and scrutiny of the Comptroller General of the Treasury.

I have stood resolutely and firmly at all times for preserving the power and jurisdiction of that office. It saves the taxpayers of this Nation many millions of dollars a year. It has been estimated that this General Accounting Office saves annually over $3,000,000 directly, and the indirect savings amount perhaps to ten times this sum.

For eight years I have worked for the consolidation of the Army and Navy, which would save $100,000,000 a year. When I began this agitation, less than a dozen Members agreed with me, but now the number has greatly increased until we nearly carried the proposition at this session.

PREVENTS WASTE IN LAND SALES

Another field in which I applied the common sense of a man who knows the value of a dollar by having earned all the dollars he ever had, is in the matter of the sale of real estate by the War Department.

During the war we acquired a great many tracts of land, some of them containing many thousands of acres, for war activities.

When a bill was brought forward to sell 48 different parcels of land, situated in 14 different States, all belonging to the War Department, I called attention to the fact that the Government was not adequately protected under the terms of the bill, and insisted upon and obtained the adoption of amendments requiring the proper appraisal of all of these lands by disinterested appraisers, and required the advertisement of such sale in newspapers of wide circulation, and also required the sale of all such parcels by public auction.

Thus, I broke up the practice of accepting sealed bids whereby favorites and pets could receive land at their own prices. Ever since that bill became law, subsequent bills before the Committee on Military Affairs calling for the sale of War Department real estate have carried all these provisions as a matter of course. I am persuaded that this work brought into the Treasury, by public advertisement and public bidding, many millions of dollars more than would have come without such precautions.

Before we stopped it, the War Department was wasting money on favorite auctioneers to sell real estate. They contracted with auctioneers to sell, on a commission basis, and one firm, on one sale, and for one day's work, made over $40,000. It seems that a high-school boy would have had more sense.

We immediately put a limitation in the law that no auctioneer should receive more than $100 a day for his services, and that was high pay.

In the same manner, I have watched all authority for appropriations for the construction of buildings, such as barracks and quarters at military posts.

I have insisted that the plans be definitely and carefully prepared in advance, and that the specifications be such that the contractors can not escape their obligation, that the work be periodically inspected, and that the Government receive credit for the materials that it may furnish in connection with such construction. I believe that this work has not only saved much money to the Government but has resulted in obtaining a better type of construction, more suitable plans for the different sections of the country, and has prevented the erecting of buildings where they were not actually needed.

INVESTIGATES GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS

Another less important incident, but illustrative of my general principles of handling Government business, is a recent investigation concerning a lease on a Government property at Port Newark, N. J. I received unofficial information that there was something very strange, to say the least, going on in connection with that property. It cost the Government $11,000,000 and was supposed to have been leased, in 1926, on terms that presumably would yield the Government a moderate rental for the property.

I conducted, through the Committee on Military Affairs, an investigation into the matter and found, to my amazement, that the property was not actually leased, but that an operating contract had been entered into, whereby the Government, instead of being the lessor, was the principal. The so-called lessee, but actually the operating agent, has had charge of the property for six years, and during that time not one single dollar has been paid into the Treasury of the United States, though the company claims that its gross receipts are about $700,000 a year. They work a shrewd arrangement, if not trick, to give excessive financial benefits to the operating agent. It is true that this agent expended about $455,000 in repairs, but all the other receipts have been consumed in so-called operating expenses. Under the head of operating expenses are not only included all labor and insurance, but even the salaries of the officials of the operating agent, which is a corporation, were paid out of the gross receipts. For part of the time some of these salaries were $25,000 a year. Of course, they pay no taxes on this Government property. They thus have an undue advantage over all their competitors in the warehouse business; paying neither taxes nor rent they can underbid all other warehouses.

Though it was admitted that the operating agent has in its hands about $65,000 belonging to the Government, this has not been paid in, because indulgent Army officers have not demanded it, and if the operating agent corporation were to become bankrupt, the Government would lose the $65,000.

It took long and hard work to get to the bottom of these things. In fact, I am not through digging yet. But I have set in motion forces which will stop this outrage. Already financially responsible warehouse men of New York City are arranging to make an offer to lease this property that will insure to the Government a fair and fixed rental for the property, and if the War Department will not cancel the outstanding contract and accept this new proposal, then I will conduct some more hearings before the Committee on Military Affairs, to find out why the War Department refuses. If necessary, I will introduce, and seek to have passed, legislation to compel the War Department to cancel the outstanding contract and to execute a fair and proper lease.

TRUSTEE OF TAXPAYERS

If I did not keep my eyes and ears wide open, and if I were not indifferent to the hostility and criticism of the War Department and its officers and agents, then I would let such matters as this slide by, and neither the Congress nor my constituents would ever know the difference. But I feel myself a trustee for the people and the taxpayers of the Nation, and being placed in the position of watchman upon the tower, when I see things going wrong, I should hate myself and should deserve the condemnation of my constituents if I failed to cry out and tell the people that something is going wrong.

HOW $50,000,000 WERE SAVED

The greatest piece of work that I have done for economy and in the interest of clean government was a fight I made, commencing in 1924 and lasting through 1925 and ending in the early part of 1926, in opposing a recommendation of the Morrow Aircraft Investigating Board to repeal the law requiring advertisement and competitive bidding in the purchase of airplanes and aircraft generally, with accessories, for the War Department and the Navy Department.

All the influence of the Coolidge administration was back of that recommendation. The whole country was worked up over the charges of Gen. William Mitchell that we were woefully backward in military aviation. The Congress seemed determined to go to any length in order to repair this deficiency. They brought before the board the Hon. Dwight W. Morrow, later ambassador to Mexico, and later still father-in-law of Col. Charles A. Lindbergh, and later still United States Senator, in support of their recommendation. Others of the board came before the committee, including Maj. Gen. James G. Harbord. But I saw that there was danger that way. To allow an Army officer or a Navy officer to make a contract to purchase airplanes amounting to many millions of dollars a year, without letting the rest of the country know when and where the contract would be made and without giving all aircraft manufacturers a chance to bid, would be inviting both corruption and extravagance.

The committee, being evenly divided upon the proposition, a joint committee was set up by authority of both the Military Affairs Committee and the Naval Affairs Committee; and being appointed upon that joint committee, I succeeded in convincing it that there was danger of another Teapot Dome scandal if we adopted the Morrow board recommendation. I finally prepared a bill which was submitted to the subcommittee and, with slight amendment, approved, and was later passed by the House, and was later accepted by the committee on conference between the House and the Senate, when the Air Corps bill was in conference, and was then approved by both Houses, and has ever since been the law, without amendment.

In a speech in the House on April 17, 1926, I predicted that both the Army and the Navy would, during the 5-year building program, expend about $150,000,000. I have had a check-up made from these two departments and find that they have spent $155,500,000. My estimate was marvelously near correct.

Furthermore, I believe that if the law requiring advertisement and competitive bidding for the purchase of such aircraft had been repealed, and if secret contracts could have been made, then perhaps one-third of all the money spent would have been wasted by the payment of unnecessarily high and unreasonable prices for aircraft. I would not charge deliberate corruption, but I would say that Army and Navy officers, inexperienced in business matters, and handling Government money, would have been the victims of shrewd and unscrupulous calculators and salesmen for the manufacturers of aircraft. Thus, a few favorite pets among the manufacturers would have received excessively profitable contracts, while the other manufacturers would have been left out in the cold.

Knowing how these things have gone in other respects, and in other departments, I am fully persuaded that this fight by me saved the taxpayers of this country fully $50,000,000. At the same time, we have gotten not only as many airplanes as we would have gotten, but I believe we have gotten better airplanes than we would have gotten. I do know that airplanes were bought by the Government, after this law went into effect, which were better and more efficient than planes which were built under special contract, and at a price but little more than one-half of the contract price for those built under special contract.

That shows that my estimate of $50,000,000 is probably correct. It means saving not only of $10,000,000 a year for the last five years, but, as the law will continue on the statute books and as we will continue to spend in the future large sums of money for the purchase of aircraft, it will mean that during all the future years the result of my work in this particular will be a saving of millions of dollars to the Government every year. We all remember how aircraft manufacturers wasted over $900,000,000 for us during the war. Not a single American-made plane ever flew over the front. The law recommended by the Morrow board would have reopened the Treasury to the same wasteful methods, and there would have been, to speak charitably, great temptation and fine opportunity for favoritism, if not private rebates and corruption.

STOPPED WASTEFUL WRECKING OF BRIDGE

For several sessions the Hon. R. Walton Moore, of Virginia, at the instigation of the United States engineers for this Washington district, kept pressing a bill before the Committee on Military Affairs to appropriate $190,000 to demolish and remove Aqueduct Bridge. In the last few years a fine new bridge had been built near this old bridge, and in their wastefulness the Army engineers could only think of spending more money to wreck the old bridge.

The huge stone piers of this old bridge and the steel framework are in good condition, and if the steel is kept painted, will last many more years. If anything should happen to the new bridge, the old bridge could be immediately used. But there was no thought of economy, and they propose to spend $190,000 to remove a good bridge that may any day become very necessary.

I alone in the committee bitterly opposed this proposition, beginning with the year 1923, and kept up the fight until they have now abandoned it. This is another example of where I saved the people money.

STILL STANDING ON PLATFORM PLEDGE

In standing for economy all the time, I have simply been doing what I promised the people in my campaign of 1920. In my printed platform at that time I stated:

> I am opposed to any further extension of Federal power, and I am opposed to the multiplication of office-holding appointments under the Federal Government. In this connection I stand for economy of an actual and practical sort, to wit, for striking from the pay rolls of the Federal Government every appointive officer whose existence is not absolutely necessary for the operation of the Federal Government. It will not do merely to talk economy, but we must practice economy. In this connection I favor the use of the machinery, trucks, tractors, and other equipment of the United States Army in the construction of public roads over which the mail shall be carried.

ECONOMY MUST PRECEDE TAX REDUCTION

On April 17, 1926, I said this in Congress:

> The taxpayer is grateful for the tax reduction made this session, but he also is concerned in our practicing the strictest economy so that other reductions may be made. Indications are that the recent cuts were not deep enough. It would be a good thing for us to face a deficiency now and then. Nations, like individuals, are safer when some impulses to extravagance and waste must be restrained.

SAVES $281,440 AT ONE STROKE

In 1925, in the closing days of the Congress, a bill was rushed before the Committee on Military Affairs, and supported by the War Department in the person of the chief of staff and the commanding general at Fort Bliss, Tex., asking for authority to buy 3,600 acres of land at a cost of $360,000 which would be $100 per acre. They stated that they had an option on this land, and that it was very cheap at $100 an acre, and unless the appropriation was immediately made, they would lose the benefit of the option.

I was not carried off my feet by this enthusiasm, but, in executive session insisted upon, and obtained, an amendment striking out the authority and direction to buy the specific tract of 3,600 acres, and authorizing the Secretary of War to buy any land situated near Fort Bliss and suitable for use in connection therewith for cavalry drill and maneuvers. This put the various landowners in the neighborhood of El Paso, Tex., to bidding against each other to sell land to the Government, and, of course, each being anxious to sell, tried to offer his land at a more attractive price than the other man. The result of my amendment was that the War Department bought 4,532 acres of land at a cost of only $78,560. Thus, by my work we got over 900 acres more land, and saved $281,440.

Thereafter, the Hon. John C. McKenzie, who was chairman of the committee when I made the fight above referred to, but who had retired from Congress, and was later chairman of the Muscle Shoals Commission, appointed by President Coolidge, wrote the following letter to me:

ELIZABETH, ILL., January 21, 1926.

Hon. J. J. McSWAIN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR FRIEND MAC: It is impossible for me to forget my association with members of the Committee on Military Affairs, and naturally I am interested in following the work of the committee, notwithstanding I am far away. I am especially pleased to note that through your efforts to guard the interest of the Government in the motion you made in connection with the Fort Bliss land bill in the last session has resulted in saving the people of our Government the snug sum of $281,440 and in the acquiring of 4,532 acres, thus giving us 900 acres more than was proposed in the bill submitted to us. Such an achievement is surely worth while, and only demonstrates the necessity of the members of that great committee being ever diligent in protecting the Government's interests. You can feel that in being alert and submitting the proper motion at the time you saved enough to warrant the retaining you in Congress the remainder of your life. I often think of you and all the boys, and I wish you all well and hope that you all will be on guard to head off not only land exploiters but personal exploiters, of which there are many.

With kind personal regards, I am,

Your friend,

JOHN C. McKENZIE.

When one has the natural Scotchman's habit of watching waste and promoting economy and the lawyer's training to follow up a clue it is easy to serve the taxpayers; but the parasites, pets, papsuckers, and pampered grafters whine and howl.

SOME RECENT WORK AS CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE

Since I became chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, on February 9, 1932, some important matters have been handled by me in that capacity.

In addition to instituting and conducting the investigation already referred to, as to the contract between the War Department and a certain corporation, for the Port Newark army base, and uncovering a situation that has cost the Government nearly a million of dollars, I have also been especially active in the investigation of the affairs of the United States Veterans' Administration, pursuant to H. J. Res. 355, introduced by Representative BLANTON, of Texas.

I was astonished and amazed by the revelations, and the longer we investigated and the more we considered the worse the situation appeared. As a direct result of the action of my committee, the famous William Wolff Smith was removed from the pay rolls of the Veterans' Administration. This was a famous case, because he had served, secure at a desk in Washington, only 13 days before the armistice, and had no disability directly due to military service but only a presumptive disability.

Furthermore, as a result of this investigation a subcommittee was appointed by me to draft a bill to meet the situation and to correct the abuses disclosed by the investigation. This subcommittee prepared and submitted a draft which became H. R. 12448, and it was reported by the committee to the House and was passed by the House promptly by a vote of 5 to 1. That bill is now pending before the Senate for action, but it seems that in the present jam it will not be acted upon until after December 1.

Also, since I became chairman there was formulated a bill for the leasing of the Government properties at Muscle Shoals, Ala. This bill contained an alternative provision that if no lessee could be obtained, then a board, appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, should operate the plant.

NATIONAL GUARD

Also, since I have been chairman, the committee has studied and reported favorably a bill to revise the law governing the National Guard in the United States and when this is enacted into law it will strengthen and encourage the National Guard as a very important component of our land defense forces. This bill is warmly supported by members of the National Guard all over the United States and especially by the National Guard Association.

ORGANIZED RESERVES

We have also studied very carefully and will be able to report in the early days of the next session important legislation revising the national defense act concerning the Organized Reserves, and I believe that this legislation holds great possibilities for the future of our country.

VOLUME OF COMMITTEE BUSINESS

In addition, a large number of less important bills, as the calendar will show, have been studied by the 10 subcommittees, and considered by the full committee, and reported to the House. There are about 1,600 bills and joint resolutions on the committee calendar, before my committee, and the 10 subcommittees have been very industrious and hard working during this session. I extend to them my thanks for their support in the carrying on of the work of the committee. Eighty-one bills have been favorably reported by the committee since I became chairman. This work, in addition to the regular office and floor work, shows that I have been a very busy man. No committee of the House, except the Committee on Claims, has reported more bills. We have certainly been active and fruitful of results.

ADDRESS OF HON. LEWIS W. DOUGLAS, OF ARIZONA

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing in the RECORD a very able and interesting address delivered over the radio on June 11 last by the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. DOUGLAS] on the subject of economy in government and the cost of government.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following very able and interesting address delivered over the radio on June 11 last by the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. DOUGLAS]:

AN APPEAL TO VETERANS AND THE UNORGANIZED MAJORITY

To-night I propose to speak on the subject of veterans' benefits. In a certain sense it is a painful task for me to do this. It is painful because as an ex-service man I have a bond of sympathy with all other ex-service men. The experiences which we had together, the adventures which fell to our common lot, naturally create a tie which time can not sever.

Yet, though the task is disagreeable, I am speaking on this subject because I feel intensely that every man, woman, and child in the United States, and the ex-service men themselves, should be made aware of the staggering burden which existing law granting benefits to veterans imposes upon our Government.

The settled and proper policy of granting benefits to veterans is that those who suffered a disability in the service of their country should be compensated.

The question arises as to whether or not this policy has been applied in practice. The only way in which an intelligent answer to the question can be made is by surveying a few of the facts.

Approximately one quarter of a million—254,000—American men were either killed or wounded during the World War. Almost a million World War veterans and their dependents—845,016—are now receiving cash benefits. At the time of the armistice there were only 882,000 American troops within the zone of hostilities. All of these were not in combat units. Almost as great a number are now receiving some sort of monetary recompense from the United States. There are, then, almost four times as many receiving benefits as there were casualties and almost as many beneficiaries as there were troops engaged with the enemy. This brief survey indicates clearly that we have strayed far from the settled policy of granting benefits to veterans.

The question arises: How has this situation affected our national finances? To-day we are spending more than a billion dollars annually in benefits to veterans of all wars. In other words, 25 cents of every dollar paid in Federal taxes goes to a war veteran. But this is not all.

During our history we have paid $16,500,000,000 to veterans of all wars. Of this sum almost five and one-half billions have been paid within a period of 14 years to World War veterans and their dependents. Or, stated another way, within a period of 14 years we have paid almost as much to World War veterans and their dependents as we have paid during a period of 70 years to Civil War veterans and their dependents, despite the fact that there were twice as many Civil War veterans in combat with the enemy as there were World War veterans within the zone of hostilities, and despite the further fact that there were almost twice as many casualties during the Civil War as there were during the World War.

This summary demonstrates that there is something radically wrong with the statutes passed by Congress under which benefits are granted and paid to veterans of the World War. But this is not all. If it were, the situation would not be so tragic. If it were, the future would be somewhat brighter.

Whereas more than 1,000,000 men are now receiving benefits from the Treasury of the United States, 10 years hence, as closely as it can be estimated, 1,400,000 will be beneficiaries of the Federal Treasury.

Whereas we are now spending over $1,000,000,000 annually and 25 cents of every dollar paid in Federal taxes on veterans, 10 years hence the annual cost will exceed $1,300,000,000, will possibly amount to $1,500,000,000, and of every dollar paid in Federal taxes more than 35 cents will go to ex-service men—and all of this under existing statutes, assuming that no additional benefits are granted by the Congress. Surely this is a staggering burden to carry. Surely the statements of fact here made should cause every American citizen who has some regard for the future of his country and for the success of democracy to pause and to ponder.

Still another question arises: If this situation be true of the United States, is it not true of other countries which participated in the World War? The answer to the question is an interesting one.

While comparison with France is not altogether fair by reason of the higher standards of living which we enjoy in this country, nevertheless it indicates to some extent the difference between the laws which we have passed and the laws which have been passed in the French Republic. The total French casualties during the World War were almost 2,900,000, or more than eleven times as many as were our casualties. Yet France is paying benefits to 150,000 less than the number receiving benefits from the United States. In spite of the fact that there were more than eleven times as many actual battle casualties in the French army, France has spent only $2,500,000,000 on her disabled veterans, or less than half as much as we have spent on our World War veterans.

The total number of casualties in the Canadian forces were 50,000 less than the total number in the American Expeditionary Forces. They were, then, less than 20 per cent smaller than ours. Yet Canada has expended only $370,000,000, or approximately one-fifteenth of the sum which we have expended. Surely this indicates that we have strayed far from the fundamental principle of compensation, namely, that of paying benefits to those who suffered disability directly attributable to their war service.

Why are we faced with this staggering burden? Why are there four times as many veterans receiving benefits as there were casualties?

Because, under the laws which Congress has enacted, thousands of men who served in the Army less than 30 days, who never put foot on ship to sail across the Atlantic, who scarcely carried a gun, who enlisted after the armistice and before July 2, 1921, are receiving large monthly cash benefits by reason of a disability incurred after their discharge from service, but before January 1, 1925—a disability which is presumably connected with their war service, but which, as a matter of fact, can not be shown to be attributable to the performance of their duty as soldiers.

And secondly, it is because Congress has passed an act known as the disability allowance act, under the terms of which a World War veteran who to-day receives a disability as a result of an automobile accident or as a result of, even in the days of prohibition, becoming intoxicated, falling and breaking a leg, or receiving some other disability, can demand and receive from twelve to forty dollars a month from the United States Treasury.

And, finally, because under laws which Congress has passed, veterans with no disability, presumably or otherwise connected with their war service, and regardless of their ability to pay, can enter a veterans' hospital, receive medical care, and be operated on for major or minor operations at no expense whatsoever to themselves.

To sum the case up: By reason of the laws which Congress has passed the United States to-day is carrying a burden of over $1,000,000,000 a year in benefits to veterans. The Federal taxpayer is paying 25 cents out of every dollar to veterans. And by reason of these same laws 10 years hence the annual burden on the United States will be approximately $1,500,000,000, and 35 cents of every dollar paid in Federal taxes will go to a veteran. Finally, by 1942 the United States will have expended over $17,000,000,000 on veterans of the World War.

This will not have been paid to those whose disability is directly attributable to their war service, to those who actually made a sacrifice for their country. On the contrary, the large part of it will have been paid to those whose disability was not attributable to their war service, and to those who as a matter of fact made no physical sacrifice while following their flag.

This is the intolerable picture to-day. And as we look ahead into the future it becomes more intolerable. The burden becomes more appalling, more staggering, so staggering that, in fact, it may bring us to the very brink of destruction, if it does not actually push us over into the chasm.

Most of the great political philosophers who lived a century ago prophesied the day when under a democratic form of government the power of organized minorities would be greater than the resistance of the legislative body. This is almost what is happening in the United States. Organized minorities come knocking at the door of Congress seeking unwittingly to impose upon the Federal Government a burden which that Government should not, and can not, carry while the unorganized majority, either through ignorance or indifference, remain complacently silent.

And so to-night I am appealing to the unorganized majority to exert their pressure, their influence, in order that veterans' legislation may be revised so as to adequately and properly care for those veterans who suffered disabilities directly attributable to their war service. To such veterans this country must express its gratitude and must extend, as an expression of that gratitude, a generous hand. But gratitude should not be carried to the extent of granting a subsidy to those whose disability was not incurred while in the service; gratitude should not proceed to the extent of destroying the country which the ex-service man fought to save, and I am appealing to-night to the ex-service men themselves and to their organizations who, I am confident, when they are made aware of the facts, will rise up in arms just as in 1917 they rose up, to say, "This thing must stop."

THE TOBACCO TAX

Mr. CHAPMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include therein a speech which I made before the Ways and Means Committee in opposition to the tobacco tax.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHAPMAN. Mr. Speaker, as the Representative of the greatest Burley-tobacco-producing district in the world, I have taken an intense interest in all legislation affecting the tobacco industry and especially in measures involving the welfare of the tobacco growers. My entire constituency depends for its prosperity in large measure upon the prosperity of the producers of tobacco.

In 1931, 400,000 farmers produced on 2,000,000 acres of land, 1,600,000,000 pounds of tobacco. In the State of Kentucky 115,000 farmers, cultivating 586,000 acres of land, produced over 500,000,000 pounds of tobacco. The Federal Government collected that year in taxes on tobacco and cigarettes $424,528,411.67, more than 80 per cent of the total "miscellaneous taxes" that went into the Federal Treasury.

The tobacco tax is the next thing to a tax on the land itself. It places a burden on those who not only produce a vast amount of the wealth but also pay more than their just share of the taxes. On December 8, the second day of this session of Congress, I introduced a bill to reduce the tax on cigarettes from $3 per thousand to $2 per thousand, and on smoking tobacco, chewing tobacco, and snuff from 18 cents per pound to 12 cents per pound.

The Congress faced the necessity of balancing the Budget, and during consideration of the tax bill for that purpose the Secretary of the Treasury proposed and advocated with his customary plausibility and forcefulness an increase of 16⅔ per cent in the tax on tobacco. If that proposal had prevailed the tax would have amounted to $1.16⅔ per pound on cigarette tobacco and 21 cents per pound on snuff, smoking, and chewing tobacco.

I entered zealously and militantly into the fight that prevented that increase. After a long, hard struggle the Ways and Means Committee decided against the proposal of the Treasury Department. During the hearings before that committee I spoke in behalf of the tobacco growers against the proposed increase in the tobacco tax. Under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include a portion of my statement delivered in January, 1932, before the Ways and Means Committee on that subject. (Revenue revision hearings, p. 586.)

My statement was in part as follows:

Mr. CHAPMAN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I wish only a few minutes in which to speak in protest against this proposed increase of tax on tobacco, in behalf of a large group of people whose voice is inarticulate. I refer to the hundreds of thousands of farmers and tobacco growers who for many decades have depended upon tobacco as their principal money crop, the crop out of the proceeds of which they have lived and defrayed their necessary expenses. They are a group of farmers who are suffering as severely as any group in America from the terrible depression through which we are passing. In fact, in my own State of Kentucky, where most of the farmers depend on the tobacco crop to pay their taxes, this year it was the exception rather than the rule to find the farmer who had sufficient money with which to pay his taxes when they fell due, and we had proposals in fiscal courts in various parts of the State for the granting of extra-legal moratoriums to farmers until next March for the payment of interest and penalties on taxes due.

We protest against this tax, first, because tobacco is the only farm product on which such a tax is collected and the only farm product on which it is proposed that such a tax be collected.

In the second place, the tobacco tax is the only war tax that is still in effect.

This is not a luxury tax. Tobacco can not be classed as a luxury. It is used by the man in the street, the man working in the factory, the man tilling the soil on the hillside. The cigarette is one thing to which millions of people can look for comfort and solace in these times of panic and depression.

The present tax of 6 cents on a package of 20 cigarettes is already as high a tax as the industry and the tobacco growers can stand. The average price of tobacco in the great Burley Belt for the crop produced in 1931 and now being marketed is estimated at 9 cents a pound. Of course, in the western part of Kentucky and Tennessee tobacco is selling for an average of not much more than half the average Burley price, and I am told that in the Carolinas the bright tobacco did not bring quite as high an average as 9 cents. The Government collects $1 a pound on the tobacco that goes into cigarettes. That is more than ten times the amount received for his Burley crop this year by the farmer, who spends almost an entire year in producing that crop, and conceding that good cigarette tobacco is averaging 20 cents, the Government still collects on every pound of that tobacco five times as much as does the grower who spends 9 or 10 months producing and marketing it, and those who know, as some of you gentlemen do, will bear witness that tobacco growing is the very hardest form of farm labor.

Mr. ESLICK. Mr. CHAPMAN, for the record, what is the average that a tobacco hand can produce in a year?

Mr. CHAPMAN. I don't know whether I can answer that question with accuracy or not, because of the different types of tobacco and the varying degrees of fertility in tobacco-growing sections.

Mr. ESLICK. It is 4 to 5 acres, is it not?

Mr. CHAPMAN. I judge so; that would probably be a fair average throughout tobacco territory.

Mr. ESLICK. Can you state what the average yield per acre is?

Mr. CHAPMAN. That varies considerably, according to the season, the type of tobacco produced, and the section in which it is produced. This year we had a rather large yield in Kentucky. Everything considered, throughout tobacco-producing territory, I would say seven or eight hundred pounds is a fair average.

In addition to the arduous labor involved in producing a crop of tobacco, there is no crop produced that extracts as much fertility from the soil and depreciates the value of farm land as does the production of tobacco.

The tobacco farmers are suffering at this time. In fact, they are in desperation in many sections of the country. Most tobacco is produced under the tenant system of cultivation, and the tenants, as a rule, are in dire poverty. A large proportion of tobacco growers in many Kentucky counties last year had to avail themselves of the opportunity to borrow money from the Government for seed to produce their crops. They are now unable to repay those loans and are urging the Congress to provide them with a year's moratorium in which to repay the seed loans. In addition to all of that, there comes a decrease in consumption. I believe Judge Parker stated that the consumption of cigarettes during the past six months has decreased 6,000,000,000. I find that in the 13 States in which laws have been enacted providing for a State tax on cigarettes and some other tobacco products the per capita consumption of cigarettes during the year 1930 was 431, as against a per capita consumption throughout the United States, including those 13 States, of 975.

Not only has the cigarette tax caused a tremendous decrease in cigarette consumption, but we find that it is about the most unpopular increase of taxes that has been proposed. There are three States in which a popular referendum was held on the proposal for such a tax. In New Mexico the vote was 53,668 against it and 9,655 for it; in Michigan the vote against it was 452,375 and 198,515 for it; in Oregon, the State of the distinguished former chairman of the committee [Mr. HAWLEY] the vote against the tobacco tax was 123,208 and the vote for it 62,254.

This unquestioned decrease in consumption causes a decrease also in the demand for tobacco, which the farmer produces, with a consequent reduction in the price he receives for his crop. In addition to that it also reduces the amount of revenue received by the Government through the tobacco tax already in existence, as has been shown so ably here to-day.

As one distinguished Member of this House said to me last evening, if we should add one additional cent to the tax on cigarettes, as has been proposed by the Treasury, making that tax 7 cents per package, and if it were possible to pass the tax to the consumer, every time that tax increase diminished consumption by one package of cigarettes, every time a man failed to buy a package of cigarettes on account of that increase of 1 cent per package it would require the sale of seven additional packages in order to make up for the loss of revenue to the Government by reason of that decrease of one package in the consumption of cigarettes. I thought he stated it very forcefully.

Now, when the manufacturer has to pay 6 cents in taxes to the Federal Government on this package of cigarettes and sells the package, as he does to the wholesaler for 12.1 cents, that leaves 2.9 cents for the wholesaler and retailer in order for the consumer to purchase the package for 15 cents. We know that the cigarette business is a highly competitive business. There is very keen competition in the sale of these popular brands. If we increase the price to the consumer to more than 15 cents, I believe it will be conceded by nearly everyone, as proven by past experience and demonstrated by these figures from official reports that have been produced here to-day, that any such increase in price to more than 15 cents per package would cause a great decrease in the volume of sales.

Therefore, since they can not profitably increase the price and must pay the Government 6 cents on every package as it is now and 7 cents as it would be if this provision were enacted into law, that means that the tax can not be increased to the consumer, and there is no other place that the burden of this proposed additional tax could fall except on the back of the tobacco grower, who is least able of all to bear the burden.

We have high authority for that conclusion, which is concurred in by practically all of the leading men in the tobacco industry. Tobacco growers throughout tobacco-producing areas are deeply stirred and disturbed by this attempt to penalize them and still further burden them by an increase of tax that would be reflected in the price received for their crops. I just received a resolution adopted yesterday by the board of directors of the Burley Tobacco Growers Cooperative Association protesting against such a tax increase and declaring, "That any increase in taxes on tobacco or tobacco products will result in additional hardships, if not in disaster, to the growers of this already over-taxed commodity." No less an authority than the distinguished chairman of the Federal Farm Board, Hon. James C. Stone, who represents tobacco on that board, and who has spent most of his life as a tobacco grower, warehouseman, and cooperative leader, has testified before a congressional committee to the effect that he believes that to have this tax reduced to one-half of what it is to-day would greatly increase consumption, without diminishing the revenue to the Government, and would bring a larger return to the farmer, whose income now it pitifully small, and who spends nearly an entire year of hard labor, besides impoverishing his soil, in producing a crop of tobacco.

There is no question of the correctness of what was stated by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] when he said to Judge Parker that a colossal sum of additional revenue must be raised, but I contend, gentlemen of the committee, that while such a sum must necessarily be raised from some sources, the farmer, whom this Government has been seeking to aid in recent years, and about whose financial distress we have heard more and read more than about the condition of any other group of American citizens—I contend that the tobacco farmer is least able of all to take upon his shoulders the additional burden that is being proposed.

Mr. VINSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHAPMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. VINSON. In that connection Mr. Ogden Mills, the Under Secretary of the Treasury, a very able economist and very able legislator, stated that the Treasury proposal was based upon the 1924 act, and in that connection Mr. Mills also stated that the increase of tax on tobacco over the rates set forth in the 1924 act, which is the rate tobacco bears to-day, was the only commodity, agricultural or otherwise, and the only industry that the increase of tax was sought from.

Mr. CHAPMAN. That is true, and not only that, for it is also true that tobacco is the only farm product on which such a tax is levied or sought to be levied. This is also the only war tax that is still in effect.

As to the suggestion that was made just before I was recognized concerning the effect on revenue from the increase on smoking tobacco—I believe the question was asked by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CANFIELD]—I think I have some figures that might throw a little light on that question. As a result of the decline in the consumption of tobacco the Federal revenues have already declined $14,000,000, accompanying a loss of volume of $33,000,000 for the manufacturers. This loss of revenue in the volume of cigarette consumption is not compensated for by the increase from manufactured tobacco, since the increased revenue from that source has been only $380,000 and the increased volume only $2,000,000. With the cigarette industry already declining, the proposed tax increase, accompanied by diminished consumption, would actually net the Government less, rather than more, revenue. Assuming a further decline of 15 per cent, which is most moderate in the light of recent experience, the Government would lose rather than gain from the increased tax.

For the fiscal year 1931 the total United States revenues from the cigarette tax were about $360,000,000. If production remains stationary the increased tax suggested would add $60,000,000, making the total $420,000,000, but if production declines 15 per cent the United States revenue from cigarettes would decrease by $63,000,000, leaving a total of $357,000,000, as compared with the $360,000,000 paid into the Federal Treasury for the fiscal year 1931.

Mr. CANFIELD. I will say to the gentleman that my question was not directed as to revenue but to the consumption of tobacco.

Mr. CHAPMAN. Oh, yes; but it certainly shows a loss of revenue, and the decline in both revenue and in the volume of manufactured products certainly indicate a decrease in consumption.

Gentlemen, it is the tobacco growers that I am representing, and I believe they are the least able of any class of farmers, and I believe of any group of citizens, to stand an increased burden like this.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I think the gentleman has made a very able statement in regard to this matter. Is it not a fact, or do you not understand it to be a fact, that agriculture was the first industry to feel the extreme depression that is now prevailing throughout the country?

Mr. CHAPMAN. Yes, sir; it is a fact.

Mr. DOUGHTON. And the imposition of further taxes on tobacco will not only further burden this industry and delay its recovery, if not prevent it entirely, but also tend to militate against general business recovery?

Mr. CHAPMAN. That is absolutely true, as the gentleman from North Carolina well says, because the prosperity of every business man, every professional man, every merchant, every banker, every industry, depends primarily on the tillers of the soil, because their prosperity is the foundation of all prosperity.

I expect to continue this fight for the tobacco growers. If I am a Member of the next Congress I shall again introduce a bill to reduce the tobacco tax. When this period of despair and suffering shall have passed and a sufficient revival of business shall have come to assure, with the practice of economy in government, a balanced Budget, one of the first revisions of the revenue act ought to be a reduction of the tobacco tax, which imposes such an unjust burden on the tobacco farmers. I will continue to strive to that end.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—FEDERAL TAXATION AND ITS RESULTS

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Speaker and my colleagues, it is true that now, with the exception of a very few minor details, the Budget is balanced. The will of the President has been consummated. It is also true that in balancing the Budget we have taxed about everything that could be taxed, thereby putting more tax burdens on the already overburdened people. We have taxed the vast fortunes and those with large incomes and they have complained because they were not taxed less and others more. We have taxed the destitute farmer and the unemployed laborer to convince him that the man without the means must, in some mysterious way yet to be determined, find money which he does not possess for the tax collector.

It is also true that the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury, chambers of commerce in cities little and big, bankers throughout the country, and practically every newspaper in the Nation strenuously cried that "the Budget must be balanced." The cry was that then prosperity would be here. But, as yet, we have received no word of an injury to any citizen who bumped into it while turning the corner. For 10 years under the administration of Mr. Mellon and Mr. Mills, with the approval of three Presidents, we have been creating this deficit. The country as a whole, at the instigation of the President, wanted this Budget balanced and this deficit cleared up within one year. Lobbyists of every strain and color insisted that to cure 10 years of promiscuous spending it was necessary to not only fix taxes for the current running expenses of the Government, but in addition thereto to fix taxes that would bring in enough money to take care of the $3,000,000,000 deficit created by the Republican administration within the last 10 years. The only way that a government can spend money is to have it. The only way that a government can procure money is by taxation. I believe that the people of the Nation generally were deceived by the propaganda of the President and the newspapers. I do not believe that it was necessary to balance the Budget in one year, and that the economic recovery of the country has been and will be seriously retarded by this balancing of the Budget in one year.

I am of the opinion that before this time next year the people of this Nation will realize that it was one of the most serious governmental mistakes ever made. This balancing of the Budget should have been spread over a period of two or more years, and not have increased by excessive taxation the destitution of an already overburdened people.

In addition to this balancing of the Budget to cure a 10-year deficit, we have been required to make up additional funds in the amount of one-half billion dollars for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and one-quarter billion dollars for the moratorium to Europe, both at the request of the President. Both of these necessitated more taxes and greater efforts to balance the Budget. Neither brought prosperity, and we were assured that both would do so.

AID TO THE BANKERS

The banking fraternity of this Nation has been insistent in its demands for greater expenditures where those expenditures would assist the banking fraternity, the money for which must be raised by taxation. At the same time the bankers were insisting that the Budget be cut. We can not decrease taxes and still run the Government by adding a billion and one-half extra expenses, no matter what particular industry or business the additional appropriations aid. Nor can prosperity be restored by taxing the people in the factories and on the land, the small homeowner and small merchant to make good the bonds of international bankers and bring back to par the overvalued stock of railroads.

It is neither fair nor just to the man who pays the taxes when the Pennsylvania Railroad can declare a dividend of $42,000,000 and within 60 days thereafter come to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and borrow $27,000,000. It is neither fair nor just to the taxpayer who must provide the funds nor to the business in other fields.

At the suggestion of the administration we passed the bill appropriating $125,000,000 to aid the Federal land banks. We were told by the leaders that this would help the farmer with his mortgaged farm, but this $125,000,000 never reached the farmer and has been used purely and simply to raise the price of Federal land bank bonds and protect the bankers and holders of the bonds. This money, too, was raised by taxes; and this bill was to help restore prosperity. Provision was made in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act to lend money to banks. Now we find that the building and loan associations can not be helped by that corporation.

AID TO BUILDING AND LOAN ASSOCIATIONS

We are asked to make an additional appropriation of one hundred and twenty-five millions to aid the building and loan associations. This has the approval of the President, and the bill will pass the House. This $125,000,000 must be raised from taxation. In my State it will not help the man who has mortgaged his home. It will help, if rightly administered, the man who has money on deposit with the building and loan associations. I have little faith in the bill, but I voted for it on the theory that some of the money might eventually trickle through to the little man.

The professional man with a small income, and small-town citizen placed his money in these building and loan associations. They suspended payment. In my State under the law the depositor is required to file notice to withdraw his funds. All over my State the building and loan associations have long lists of depositors who have filed notice. They must be paid off in order of their filing if the money is available. If the associations borrow from this fund those depositors who have made demand will be eligible for payment. They will get their money, I hope. But what relief is there in the bill for the poor unfortunate who is financing his home through the association? Out of work—without income to meet his payments of principal, interest, and taxes. He is losing his home with the savings of his lifetime in it. What relief is there for him? Where is his moratorium? It is the old story all over again of all our relief legislation. It is built to protect and aid the man with personal property. For the man with real estate there is no relief. To obtain aid he must hold bonds or stocks or certificates of indebtedness.

We should not appropriate $125,000,000 for the building and loan associations when the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has a billion and one-half dollars. The building and loan associations should be allowed to discount their paper and procure loans from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation just the same as railroads, banks, and insurance companies are allowed to do. But the administration is opposed to allowing the building and loan associations to borrow money from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation on the same basis as these other businesses and insists that a special act be passed to take care of the building and loan associations. We have given approximately $2,000,000,000 for the benefit of big business and Wall Street. We have not given one cent toward putting money into circulation on Main Street.

A year ago we were told that our present economic condition was due to a world-wide depression and that prosperity would return to us if we granted a moratorium to Europe. We granted that moratorium at a cost in taxes of $2.50 to every man, woman, and child in the United States. The bankers profited by that moratorium and the people lost.

Prosperity, although one year has elapsed, has not returned. Next the President insisted that only through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and loans to big business could the panic be ended. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation act passed and we gave $2,000,000,000 to Wall Street and the international bankers, who had already fleeced this country with worthless bonds of foreign nations. Six months have elapsed and to-day 15,000 unemployed World War veterans are encamped over in Anacostia Park in a vain search for the promised work and prosperity.

THE PRESIDENT CAN REDUCE EXPENSES

The Chief Executive has made much of a reduction in governmental expenditures through consolidations and elimination of useless employees. Through the newspapers he has called on Congress for the elimination of these employees. This is but a smoke screen to cover up and hide from the people the facts of his failures. The President well knows that he now has the power and always has had the power to eliminate any positions in the executive departments. He now has and has always had the power to reduce governmental expenses by discharging any employee in the State Department, the Commerce Department, the War Department, or any other department not held by an elected officer.

The Supreme Court so held and if there is a useless employee in any of these departments then the fault lies with the President of the United States and no one else and the President of the United States has been derelict in his duty to the taxpayer in allowing them to remain. All of the legislation that the President suggested and approved as a cure for our present panic has proven to be a tonic for Wall Street and a dose of poison for the taxpayer. What the Nation needs above all things else to-day is a leader that will turn his eyes from the glitter of gold and let them rest for a while on the destitute and impoverished—a leader that will place the good of all the people above the demands of a few. A Chief Executive that will divorce his thoughts from Wall Street long enough to remember that there is a Main Street in America.

ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7726) to provide for the immediate payment to veterans of the face value of their adjusted-service certificates, passed by the House of Representatives on the 15th instant, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Title V of the World War adjusted compensation act, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof three new sections to read as follows:

"PAYMENT OF CERTIFICATES BEFORE MATURITY

"SEC. 509. (a) The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is authorized and directed to pay to any veteran to whom an adjusted-service certificate has been issued, upon application by him and surrender of the certificate and all rights thereunder (with or without the consent of the beneficiary thereof), the amount of the face value of the certificate as computed in accordance with section 501.

"(b) No payment shall be made under this section until the certificate is in the possession of the Veterans' Administration, nor until all obligations for which the certificate was held as security have been paid or otherwise discharged.

"(c) If at the time of application to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs for payment under this section, the principal and interest on or in respect of any loan upon the certificate have not been paid in full by the veteran (whether or not the loan has matured), then, on request of the veteran, the Administrator shall (1) pay or otherwise discharge such unpaid principal and so much of such unpaid interest (accrued or to accrue) as is necessary to make the certificate available for payment under this section, and (2) deduct from the amount of the face value of the certificate the amount of such principal and so much of such interest, if any, as accrued prior to October 1, 1931.

"(d) Upon payment under this section, the certificate and all rights thereunder shall be canceled.

"(e) A veteran may receive the benefits of this section by application therefor, filed with the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs. Such application may be made and filed at any time before the maturity of the certificate, (1) personally by the veteran, or (2) in case physical or mental incapacity prevents the making or filing of a personal application, then by such representative of the veteran and in such manner as may be by regulations prescribed. An application made by a person other than a representative authorized by such regulations, or not filed on or before the maturity of the certificate, shall be held void.

"(f) If the veteran dies after the application is made and before it is filed it may be filed by any person. If the veteran dies after the application is made it shall be valid if the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs finds that it bears the bona fide signature of the applicant, discloses an intention to claim the benefit of this section on behalf of the veteran, and is filed before the maturity of the certificate, whether or not the veteran is alive at the time it is filed. If the death occurs after the application is made, but before the negotiation of the check in payment, payment shall be made to the estate of the veteran irrespective of any beneficiary designation, if the application is filed (1) before the death occurs, or (2) after the death occurs, but before the mailing of the check in payment to the beneficiary under section 501.

"(g) Where the records of the Veterans' Administration show that an application, disclosing an intention to claim the benefits of this section, has been filed before the maturity of the certificate, and the application can not be found, such application shall be presumed, in the absence of affirmative evidence to the contrary, to have been valid when originally filed.

"SEC. 510. If at the time this section takes effect a veteran entitled to receive an adjusted-service certificate has not made application therefor he shall be entitled, upon application made under section 302, to receive at his option either the certificate under section 501 or payment of the amount of the face value thereof under section 509.

"SEC. 511. The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, in the exercise of his powers to make regulations for payment under section 509 shall to the fullest extent practicable provide a method by which veterans may present their applications and receive payment in close proximity to the places of their residence."

SEC. 2. Payment of the face value of the adjusted-service certificates under section 509 or 510 of the World War adjusted compensation act, as amended, shall be paid in Treasury notes.

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue United States notes to the extent required to make the payments herein authorized. Such notes shall be legal tender for public and private debts and printed in the same size, of the same denominations, and of the same form as Treasury notes, omitting the reference to any Federal reserve bank.

He shall place such notes in the Federal reserve banks, subject to the order of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, to be used for the purposes of this act.

He shall issue a like amount of United States bonds bearing 3½ per cent interest, payable semiannually, with coupons attached, and such bonds shall be due and payable in 20 years from the date of issue, subject to the right of redemption after 10 years.

These bonds shall be deposited in the Federal reserve banks, as the agents of the United States, in approximate proportion to their current assets at the date of the passage of this act, and the Federal Reserve Board, by resolution in writing, may direct the sale to the public of such portions of said bonds as it may from time to time desire.

Such currency received for such bonds shall be exchanged for the notes hereby authorized to be issued, and they shall be returned to the Secretary of the Treasury for cancellation.

SEC. 3. This act may be cited as the "Emergency adjusted compensation act, 1932."

The bill was reported adversely yesterday from the Committee on Finance by Mr. SMOOT, who submitted the following report:

[Senate Report No. 834, Seventy-second Congress, first session]

PAYMENT OF ADJUSTED-COMPENSATION CERTIFICATES

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Finance, submitted the following report (to accompany H. R. 7726):

The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7726) to provide for the immediate payment to veterans of the face value of their adjusted-service certificates, having considered the same, report adversely thereon with the recommendation that the bill do not pass.

STATEMENT

The proposal embodied in this bill is that immediate payment be made to any veteran to whom an adjusted-service certificate has been issued of the amount of the face value of the certificate. This bill would necessitate an expenditure of $2,400,000,000. To effect the payment the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to issue United States currency notes, such notes to be legal tender for public and private debts. At the time of placing such notes in Federal reserve banks subject to the order of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to be used for the purposes of the act, the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to issue a like amount of United States bonds bearing 3½ per cent interest payable in 20 years. Such bonds are to be sold from time to time by direction of the Federal Reserve Board and the currency received therefor is to be used for the retirement of notes to be issued under the act.

The aggregate face amount of the outstanding adjusted-service certificates is about $3,515,000,000. This amount is, for the most part, however, not due until 1945, and the certificates have an aggregate present value of about $1,880,000,000 discounted on the basis of 4 per cent per annum. For the Government to pay now a sum which is not due until 1945 would in effect increase the amount of the original grant made by the Congress to the veterans by the difference between the face value of the certificates and their present value, or by about $1,635,000,000. It is of the essence of the plan of the adjusted-service certificates that they mature and be paid at the expiration of 20 years from the date of issue, or upon death should that occur earlier. Any acceleration of the time for payment has the same effect as increasing the amount of the original bonus grant.

Under the plan for the adjusted-service certificates as adopted in 1924, the face or maturity value of the certificates was fixed as follows:

For each veteran there was determined a basic amount equivalent to $1.25 per day for each day of service overseas and $1 per day for each day of service in this country in excess of the first 60 days. This amount was then increased by 25 per cent because of deferred payment. The total so arrived at was used as a net single premium to fix the amount of the adjusted-service certificate, maturing in 20 years, on the basis of the American experience table of mortality, with interest at 4 per cent compounded annually. The adjusted-service certificate is essentially a 20-year endowment insurance policy. The aggregate amount called for by the certificates at maturity was to be met by the Government through setting aside each year in the adjusted-service certificate fund amounts which, invested at 4 per cent, would equal the face value of the certificates at maturity.

Most generous provisions have been made by our Government for the care of dependents of those who gave their lives to their country and for the care of the wounded, disabled, and ill veterans and their dependents. On this point the adverse report on this bill from the Committee on Ways and Means of the House stated:

"The Government of the United States has already paid on account of veterans of the World War up to date $6,000,000,000, and according to the testimony of General Hines, if we continue at our present rate, with no authorizations increasing our present commitments, by 1945 we will probably expend for World War veterans $21,500,000,000 which will about equal the cost of our participation in the World War.

"We have spent for veterans of all other wars previous to the World War up to date in all the history of the country only $8,000,000,000.

"It can, therefore, not be seriously contended that the Government has not been liberal with veterans of the World War. On their account we are practically now in our commitments financing another war as expensive as was our participation in the World War."

The Government is now expending for the benefit of all veterans about $1,000,000,000 a year. This amounts to nearly one-fourth of the total expenditures of the Government.

It is not contended by proponents of this measure that under present conditions the Government could or should provide funds from its revenues or from borrowings in the usual course to pay the $2,400,000,000 which would be required for the payment of the certificates. The deficit of the Government for the fiscal year 1932 will amount to more than $2,800,000,000 without regard to the provisions of this bill. Up to May 31 the gross public debt had increased to over $18,600,000,000, an amount more than $2,000,000,000 in excess of the public debt outstanding a year earlier. Included in the amount of the Government debt outstanding is nearly $4,000,000,000 of obligations maturing within a year.

To maintain the finances of the Government upon an unassailable basis Congress has recently enacted a revenue measure drastically increasing rates of taxation and imposing many new levies. Congress is now engaged in working out the economy legislation based upon the necessity of effecting all practical reductions in Government expenditures.

The proposal in the bill is that the Government should make the payment to the veterans in the form of United States Treasury notes to be created simply by the operation of the printing press. These notes would have no gold cover. It is proposed that concurrently with the issue of the notes there should be placed in the Federal reserve banks 3½ per cent 20-year Government bonds to be sold at the discretion of the Federal Reserve Board with a view to obtaining currency which could be used for ultimate retirement of the legal-tender notes.

The existence of United States bonds in the hands of the Federal reserve banks does not change the status of the notes. Such bonds would merely represent a different form of obligation of the Government to pay, not in itself adding anything to the obligation expressed by the currency notes themselves. These bonds would represent the mere possibility that at some future date the Government might sell its obligation and secure funds for the retirement of the legal-tender notes. That possibility would be present regardless of whether the bond issue was provided for in advance. The existence of an anticipatory supply of bonds to be marketed by the Federal reserve banks at their discretion would seriously complicate normal Government finances.

It is asserted by proponents of this measure that the Government has at its disposal gold stock amply sufficient to warrant the issue of these notes. The total stock of monetary gold in the country on May 31, 1932, was $4,149,000,000. Of this amount, however, the total amount of free gold in the Treasury not specifically allocated was but $20,000,000. The balance of the gold stock was partly in circulation, but was largely held either by the Government for the Federal reserve system or by the reserve system itself for definite commitments. The following table sets forth the form and distribution of the gold stock:

Monetary stock of gold, May 31, 1932

Held in the Treasury:
Against gold certificates—
Held by Federal reserve banks	671
In circulation	735
Reserve against United States notes and Treasury notes of 1890	156
Held for Federal reserve banks and agents	1,566

In the general fund of the Treasury:
Allocated against specific gold liabilities of the Treasury	54
Free gold, not specifically allocated	20
Gold coin and bullion held by Federal reserve banks	512
Gold coin in circulation	435

The amount of the free gold of the Federal reserve system itself as of the 31st day of May included in the above total was approximately $1,140,000,000. This amount of the free gold of the Federal reserve system, representing the capacity of the system to stand withdrawals of gold and to meet increased demands for currency and increase in member-bank reserve balances, does not belong to the Treasury and is not, therefore, available to the Treasury to be placed behind Treasury obligations.

The effect of issuing large volumes of legal-tender notes at this time would undoubtedly be to increase the drain upon gold. It would be the natural tendency of those who receive the legal-tender notes to replace them by established currency, particularly by gold. Under the act of March 14, 1900, the Treasury is required to maintain the parity of all forms of currency with the gold dollar. This means that regardless of its stock of gold the Government could be called upon to furnish gold in exchange for the entire amount of the legal-tender notes.

The effect of the tendency to require gold in place of the legal-tender notes would naturally be to send gold to a premium as compared with other forms of currency to cause or accelerate gold hoarding and to stimulate a flight from the dollar. During the recent months there has been a loss in the country's gold stock, through the exportation of gold, in excess of $500,000,000. It is believed that foreign balances in this country have been reduced to such point that further exportation is not probable, but any strain upon confidence in the dollar, any tendency to increase the demand for gold in this country would be likely, however, to increase the pressure upon the export of gold and to cause resumption and even acceleration in the gold drain.

The effect of the resort by this Government to legal-tender notes upon its financial affairs and also upon the business economy of the Nation would be disastrous. This is vividly shown by recent European experience. If it is once determined that funds to meet Government expenditures can be obtained by the mere issuance of Government currency notes, there will be an inevitable tendency to meet all Government obligations in that way. If this plan is good for the payment of the veterans, it is equally good for the payment of Government employees and other Government obligations. Resort to such a plan nullifies the will and effort to accomplish Government financing through normal and accredited methods.

The whole body of our people, and the veterans themselves, have far more to gain from the restoration of normal business conditions in this country through adherence to sound Government finance than from any experiment with the printing press as a means of Government finance.

There is no evidence that the veterans as a class are any more in need than other groups of our citizens. Rejection of this measure in no way indicates indifference to existing needs of the veterans and of other citizens. It indicates determination to adhere in the conduct of our Government to those principles which have contributed to the development and strength of our country, and which are essential to the achievement of recovery, through which our whole people, including the veterans, will benefit.

A suggested amendment submitted to the committee by Senator THOMAS does not seem to us to meet the vital objections to the bill. Under this amendment it would be provided that payments of the face value of certificates would be made only in cases where the applicant shall state that he is in need of the funds. The fact that the applicant has already secured a loan on his certificate would be taken as prima facie evidence of the need. The effect of this amendment would be merely to require an additional statement by the applicant. Indeed, that statement could be made a mere matter of form by any applicant who would first obtain a loan upon his certificate to which he is entitled as a matter of right. It seems probable that such a requirement would not to any material degree reduce the amount of the payment called for. The amendment in no way removes the dangerous features of the bill which are above set forth.

The amendment proposed by Senator CONNALLY would confine any payments which might be made to veterans at this time to the cash value of the adjusted-service certificates, this to be calculated on the basis of the amount of the original adjusted-service credit to the veteran, increased by 25 per cent, with interest at 4 per cent compounded annually added thereto, making no reduction for the cost of the insurance benefits previously enjoyed under the certificate. The amount of the net payment which would be called for under this plan is estimated at approximately $1,300,000,000. The amendment contemplates that the amount required for the payment should be met by the Government in the ordinary way and not through the issue of legal-tender notes. It is the belief of the committee that the condition of the Treasury at this time and the urgent necessity of applying to the Budget all available tax revenues and of terminating borrowing preclude favorable consideration of this amendment.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, on the 22d day of May, 1929, I introduced the first bill in the Senate and in the Congress for the cash payment of the soldiers' bonus. That bill was numbered S. 1222. Some time afterwards Congressman PATMAN, of Texas, came to me and asked to introduce the bill in the House. I was glad to have his cooperation. With some modification he did introduce the bill and has made a gallant fight for its passage and has finally succeeded in having it passed through the House by a substantial majority. It is now before the Senate for consideration upon its merits.

Mr. President, there is a philosophy surrounding the economic rights of the soldiers which I think has been disregarded throughout the history of our country. In the old days, when we had no national income to tax, there was perhaps some excuse for taking the soldier upon his patriotism alone and without any just economic compensation. But even the soldiers of the Revolutionary War, after the war was over, had to appear before Congress in a walking, living petition, as the soldiers are now appearing before the Senate to-day. Congress even moved its place of sitting from Philadelphia over to Princeton to avoid the soldiers, but they followed and they finally got what they asked.

So, Mr. President, the bonus army, or the Bonus Expeditionary Force, or whatever it may be called, has a precedent in early history for the course it is taking now. Besides that these men had just as well be camped here in Washington as anywhere. They have no jobs at home; they have nothing to eat at home. I see no reason why 100,000 or 200,000 or 500,000 of them should not assemble in the Capital if they so choose.

These men have assembled here as orderly American citizens. They are asking simply for what they deem and what I deem to be their just rights. I think there is not a soldier in the whole army but would rather be given a job than a direct payment of the bonus. If they had jobs, if they had work, they could earn a living and they would be glad to do it and to dispense with payment of the bonus for the present moment. But, Mr. President, the philosophy which has said that the soldier must serve on patriotism and without pay has also said throughout the history of our country that we should turn capital loose to profiteer by millions and hundreds of millions and in the late war by billions of dollars out of the blood money of the war. It is the carrying through of that philosophy to its logical conclusion which has finally turned these men out of their jobs to protect the excessive and ill-gotten earnings of big capital in our country.

Therefore, Mr. President, it was in contradiction of that philosophy that I first introduced this bill into the Congress, and I have said and now repeat that just so long as our country permits millions and billions to be made out of the blood money of war, I shall vote for every pension and every bonus and every form of compensation for the soldiers of the Army for which I have an opportunity to vote; and after all these things shall have been done the soldiers will still not be rewarded anything like in comparison to the rewards that have been taken by capital in war profits in the various wars of our country, and particularly in the World War.

Mr. President, the original bill as I offered it provided for an issue of Treasury bonds to be known as adjusted-compensation bonds. The bill as it is now before us provides for an issuance of bonds and Treasury notes. It would please me better, Mr. President, if the bond feature were entirely removed from the bill, and this bonus or adjusted-compensation were to be paid solely by the issuance of Treasury notes. There are several reasons why I make that statement. The economic policy of giving to capital the net earnings of our country and disregarding men has at last plunged us into this great depression. Our national income in 1929, in the year of boom and prosperity, was about $90,000,000,000. That would be about $3,750 for each average family. In 1930 our national income was about $70,000,000,000, and in 1931, even in that year of deep depression, the national income of our country was over $60,000,000,000. Sixty billion dollars means $2,500 for each average family in the United States. That, Mr. President, is enough of a national income, had it been distributed, to have prevented a depression in our country and to have obviated the necessity of soldiers looking for jobs. But how was it distributed?

The same policy that gave capital enormous war profits and gave soldiers a dollar a day has resulted in the discharge of workingmen in this time of peace and in the hoarding of capital in the coffers of the big economic combinations. I will be more specific.

The American Telephone & Telegraph Co. for last year had the biggest earnings in all its history, but it discharged thousands of its men. Two or three weeks ago the president of Maryland University, formerly president of the agricultural college of my own State, asked me to go to a vesper service at the University of Maryland, stating that Rabbi Israel, of Baltimore, would speak upon economic questions. He said Rabbi Israel was worth hearing. I went. He was worth hearing. Rabbi Israel told this, among other things: He said that the Consolidated Gas Co., of Baltimore, last year set aside a million dollars for depreciation of its property over and above actual depreciation, and it set aside another million dollars for surplus; that it paid a 14 per cent dividend upon its capital stock, and then discharged a thousand of its men. One of the men who had been an employee of that company for 18 long years at a barely living wage within two months after his discharge was unable to pay his gas bill and the company shut off the gas. That, Mr. President, is the attitude of big business toward these demands.

I also regret to state that it seems to be the attitude of many Members of the Senate, and it seems to be somewhat the attitude of the great Republican Party itself. In the convention recently held by that party there was no resolution adopted mentioning the bonus proposition at all, but I read this:

> The people themselves, by their own courage, their own patient and resolute effort in the readjustments of their own affairs, can and will work out the cure. It is our task as a party, by leadership and a wise determination of policy, to assist that recovery.

I think, Mr. President, this is the first time the great Republican Party has entirely thrown up its hands; that this is the first time it has officially admitted in its platform that it can not cure the depression, and has thrown back upon the people themselves the task of working it out by the arrangement of their own private affairs. That, Mr. President, is certainly a deplorable situation for a great party now in power in the United States. And how are the people to work this problem out for themselves? Tell me what these soldiers assembled here in Washington can do to solve this problem for themselves. Where else can they go to find employment? What can they do that will relieve this situation and restore prosperity?

Mr. President, I think we were put into this condition largely by acts of the Government of the United States. At the close of the war the Government itself collected a tax of some $11,000,000,000 on profits and loaned that amount to foreign countries, and that $11,000,000,000 has now become a bonus to foreign peoples because most of it will not be repaid. We have already granted one moratorium, and it is evident that another and yet another will have to be granted. So our Government, Mr. President, has not hesitated to enter into the field of paying bonuses, even to foreign peoples.

I also remember that the Congress appropriated some $24,000,000 out of the Treasury of the United States for the relief of the famine-stricken people of Russia, and I remember how the present President of the United States administered that fund for the relief of those starving people.

Then, in 1920, after the war was over, we passed a railroad law—the transportation act—to guarantee war-time profits to the railroads for six months after they were turned back into private ownership. The railroads padded their accounts enormously in order to make a deficit in that guaranty; they padded them nearly a billion and a half dollars, and that, of course, made a deficit; that would make a defiicit in almost anything. Then we wrote checks on the Treasury of the United States for $529,000,000 to pay that bonus to the railroads of the United States, and that on the basis of the war profits that had been guaranteed to them during the period of Government operation.

Furthermore, Mr. President, in addition to that, in that law we provided that the railroads might earn more than 6 per cent, if they would return half the amount above 6 per cent to the United States Treasury. Under that provision of the law—commonly called the recapture clause—the Treasury has earned $361,000,000, but it has not been paid into the Treasury; it is still held by the railroads; it is still held as a further bonus to the railroads out of the United States Treasury; and already a bill has been reported by a committee of the House of Representatives to repeal that recapture clause and turn this $361,000,000 further bonus over to the railroads.

Mr. President, are the railroads entitled to all this against the claims of the dollar-a-day soldiers of the United States? I have some recent information upon that subject which I desire to put into the RECORD. The railroads, and other big financial institutions for that matter, have their expert financial writers to write up financial and economic conditions as they want them published to the people of the United States. Those stories are written without any regard whatever to the truth; they are written having solely in mind the policy of the railroad or the big financial institution that employs the writer. When I told the Senate some little time ago of this circumstance the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] rose and said that he knew an instance where one of these writers wrote a letter to his boss and stated, "This is written according to your policy, but I inclose another letter which tells you the truth about the situation," and that inclosed letter was vastly different from the policy of the big boss.

So, Mr. President, these financial institutions have their reporters who submit other reports different from those that are published in the newspapers, and those other reports are in the form of confidential letters. Occasionally I get hold of one of those letters. I have one here dated January 25, 1932. It is a review of economic conditions for big business in 1931, the second year of the depression. Now, note what it says:

> The most challenging economic statistics of the depression are that, in spite of the fact that production volume and wage payments have gone down together to barely more than half the predepression volume, the grand total of interest and dividend payments—

Much stock was transferred into bonds and interest was paid and collected instead of dividends. Hence, the letter says:

> The grand total of interest and dividend payments has been maintained higher than for any year prior to 1929.

That was in 1931, the second year of the depression. Then the writer says:

> Even the dividend payments of the railroads this year have exceeded those for 1928 and for any previous year in railroad history.

Yet, Mr. President, these wise financial writers filled our papers with stories of the poverty of the railroads, demanded a 15 per cent rate advance last year, and secured a part of it, in the face of the fact that they had had greater dividends in 1931 than in any year of railroad history save 1929, and in spite of the further fact, which the evidence in that record shows, that they had collected a surplus of four and a half billion dollars in excessive rates charged to the people of the United States.

Mr. President, that is not all the bonus that the railroad law gave to the railroads, either. It gave them a valuation of $18,900,000,000 in 1920 as the basis of levying rates upon the people of the United States; and at the identical moment that that value was fixed by law and by its administration, the market value of these railroads, as shown by the quotations of their stocks and bonds on the stock exchange where they listed them themselves and where they sold them to you or to anybody who would buy railroad stocks and bonds, was about $11,750,000,000. So, Mr. President, another bonus of this vast sum of more than $7,000,000,000 was decreed to the railroads by an act of the Congress of the United States.

Under the rules of valuation laid down at that time, that being the peak of high inflation and high values, that value was continued down to date, and all increased capital has been added to it. Now, however, we find in the Senate committee a report striking out of the appropriation for the Interstate Commerce Commission $2,000,000,000 for valuation expenses. That will enable the railroads to avoid bringing the valuation up to date and reducing it down to the present level of prices as against the high prices of 1920; and that will enable them to maintain this high value through this depression, unless it is overthrown by the Senate itself. It will also enable them to retain the $361,000,000 of recapture bonus to which I have already alluded.

Mr. President, I am not to-day going to attempt to review all of the special privileges which the Congress has by law given to all of the various financial institutions of our country; but I might mention one or two more at least.

We enact tariff laws that enable protected industries to fix the price of their products at the factory and raise the American price level above the general world price level. It has been estimated that that bonus amounts to four or five billions of dollars; and these soldiers who drew that dollar a day pay during the war must pay their share of that bonus to the big industries of our country in order to maintain this price level. The soldiers, perhaps, do not object to paying their share of that tariff protection. If that provided jobs and furnished them employment, they would, perhaps, be glad to contribute their share. But as soon as depression comes along, as soon as times get bad, these same big institutions, 2 of which I have described in detail, and on 173 of which we have reports, discharge these men and cease to furnish them the jobs which the protective system intends that they should have.

So the Government of the United States has done much for everybody but the common people of the United States.

When this session of Congress convened, the first bill that appeared, bill No. 1, in the Senate of the United States, was for an appropriation of $500,000,000 at once out of the Treasury, and a liability of $1,500,000,000 more upon the Treasury of the United States in bonds—two thousand million dollars, almost as much as this bonus to the soldiers themselves—and what was to be done with this vast sum? It was to be loaned, first, to these railroads that had the biggest dividends last year of any year of their history except one. Then it was to be loaned to big banks and to insurance companies.

Mr. President, that bill had almost the unanimous support of the Senate. I think only three of us voted against it. Then, after we finally got a couple of hundred millions inserted in it for the relief of closed banks, which would send some little relief down to the depositors among the common people, even we let that bill pass without further opposition. That is a bonus in the way of loans to the big financial institutions of the country; and it is proposed, I believe, to increase that bonus by another billion and a half of dollars before this session closes. Yet here are 750,000 and perhaps 1,000,000 of the men who enlisted under the flag of their country, who went out and served at a dollar a day in payment, one-third of their earnings in private life, now turned out of jobs, now without any place to live or anything to eat, and the Congress of the United States is still hesitating about giving them immediate and adequate relief!

I want to congratulate the House of Representatives on its action in this matter. I hope the Senate will take like action; but the word that comes to me is all different. These secret polls that are reported say that there are from 56 to 60 votes against any bonus measure in the United States Senate, and it is destined to go down to defeat and not even go up to the President, because they want to protect him from a veto.

Mr. President, that is the exact situation. I therefore insist that the Government of the United States must be humanized. The Government of the United States can not continue as an institution to protect the earnings of capital. The Government of the United States can not continue as an institution that will neglect the very men who defend its life in case of need. Therefore, I hope the Senate will vote this bonus.

I should prefer, as I have said, that it be done by Treasury notes entirely. I want to discuss the merits of that proposition for a moment.

There has been a lot of talk about balancing the Budget. This theory of balancing the Budget has been a nightmare to everybody in the Congress since the session began. Why all of this uneasiness about balancing the Budget? In time of war we did not balance the Budget with taxation. We balanced it with bond issues in those times; and one of the greatest financial men of the world, Henry Ford, says we were a big bunch of fools for using bonds to balance the Budget then, that we ought to have balanced it then with legal-tender Treasury notes.

What is there to maintain those bonds? What is there to keep them up to par? Nothing but the taxing power of the United States Government. That is all that there is behind them. If they had been legal-tender Treasury notes, without interest, the same taxing power would have been behind them for their ultimate redemption that there was for their ultimate payment in the form of bonds; and it would not have required as much taxing power to back the Treasury notes as it did the bonds, because the Treasury notes would have carried no interest.

We are paying now to the bondholders of the country over $600,000,000 in interest each year—an extra burden upon the taxing power of the country over and above those bonds.

Therefore I think it is perfectly sound that in time of war and in time of emergency we should balance the Budget with Treasury-note issues. There is no logical comparison with Civil War times or with any other times in the history of any other country, when the country itself is near dissolution and destruction. We issued and have now outstanding $346,000,000, I believe, of these legal-tender Treasury notes that have come down to us from Civil War times; and they are good money, just as good as gold itself, to-day. This country now, with its $60,000,000,000 of national income in a year of depression, with its $90,000,000,000 of national income in a year of prosperity, could sustain $5,000,000,000 or $10,000,000,000 of Treasury notes easier than the Government so nearly destroyed by Civil War could sustain that $346,000,000 at the end of the Civil War period.

No; there is money in it for the big financial crowd if it is bonds, and interest on bonds. If they can control these bonds, there are more war profits to be taken in peace time out of the Government of the United States; and the Liberty bonds we issued during the war and then sold to the soldiers—practically forcing them to buy their little share of bonds out of this $1 a day of compensation—and sold to the common people over the country, were afterwards, by the most vicious manipulation in the history of the world, depreciated and forced down as low as 80 cents on the dollar. Then, after they were bid in at that low price, they were again manipulated and brought back to par, and billions of profits were taken out of the manipulation even of Government bonds themselves.

Mr. President, the common sense of the situation demands that this country look into this proposition from the foundation up. I do not believe, nor does anybody believe, in unlimited Treasury-note issues. There is a limit, of course, beyond which we can not go; but at the present time commodity prices are so low that the farmers of the country can not live on the prices they get, and yet here are our men by the millions starving because they have nothing to eat.

An issue of Treasury notes and the payment of this bonus would raise those commodity prices. I do not think the whole amount would raise them half enough; but that issue would do the farmers of the country more good than it would the soldiers themselves. On the other hand, if the payment of this bonus were made, it would create a great industrial demand throughout the United States. It would start many of the wheels of industry turning, and that would give to those who are now unemployed the jobs which they need so sorely and start us on a sound foundation for prosperity. Our $2,000,000,000 of loans to railroads and to banks and to insurance companies has only postponed the evil day. How are those banks going to pay their notes when they come due, with hogs at $2.55 a hundred and corn at 21 cents a bushel? They will not be able to do it, and their indebtedness and their burdens will only be increased. If we pay these soldiers, if we start at the bottom of this thing, and put this money in where it will start industries and make orders in different lines of industry, we will then be beginning at the foundation of the depression and really doing something to remedy the situation.

If we raise these commodity prices at the same time by this issue of notes, we will start agriculture again toward the prosperity which has been absent since the deflation of 1920.

Therefore, Mr. President, I say to you that this bonus bill is not only in the interest of the soldiers themselves, it is in the interest of this agricultural part of our country, a third of all our people; it is in the interest of this seven or eight million who are unemployed in the United States; it is sound business policy, and therefore it would be indirectly in the interest of business itself. It is the only patriotic course this country can take under the flag which these men defended.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I favor this legislation. I favor it because I think it is fundamentally right. It is either right or wrong. If it is right to be thoroughly grateful to those who have defended the country in its time of peril, now that they are needy and ragged, and are asking for clothing and food from a grateful Government, then the bill should pass. If it is wrong for a nation to take care of those who have defended it in time of peril, to deal generously with them, and considerately, then the bill should fail.

I do not like the term "bonus" as connected with this measure. It is not a bonus; it is a debt due the men who served in the last war, a debt which has been acknowledged to be a debt by this Government itself. Therefore, there is no occasion, it seems to me, to continue to refer to this "bonus" bill as if the soldiers of America were seeking to hold up the Treasury of the United States for something that was not right, or something they expected in addition to that to which they are justly entitled.

Mr. President, war is a futile thing, and yet nations engage in it. War generally is supposed to settle questions; but war settles no questions, as a rule. The last war, for instance, which was a war to end all war, has left the world in far worse shape than it was at the outbreak of that great conflict. But nations will engage in war, and I assume that as long as human nature is as it is war will continue to be indulged in.

That being true, I want this country ever to be prepared to defend itself in any emergency that might arise, with an Army, Navy, and Marine Corps equal to any on the face of the globe, and with the country keeping abreast of the times in scientific development and invention all along the line.

First of all, however, and foremost, I am anxious that our children who come after us may understand definitely that this country is grateful to those who are willing to defend it with their lives.

I go farther, Mr. President; in my judgment a nation that will not deal considerately and generously and kindly with those who have borne the battle, those who have defended it in time of peril, does not deserve to be defended if trouble comes. I am anxious for my country to keep the faith with these lads who have defended it in the years gone by, so that the children coming on, when the country is imperiled again, as it will be imperiled again, may be thoroughly willing, even anxious, to go out in its defense.

If nations want war and must have war, Mr. President, they must pay for it, and they must pay dearly. The unfortunate thing about war is that those who make war do not pay. The last war, for instance, was made in this Chamber and in the House at the other end of the Capitol. Ninety-six men here and 435 men over there made the war. They made possible the fateful declaration, and what a terrible thing they did.

I do not criticize it; I do not censure either their action or their motive at that time. There was the best reason in the world, I suppose, for declaring war, although we had been led to believe we were not to be engaged in it, and a presidential campaign had been won on the slogan that the candidate of one of the great parties had kept us out of war. Notwithstanding that fact, before that successful candidate was inaugurated in the Presidency the following March the 4th, in February of that same year, war had been urged by that same candidate, who was then the President and Chief Executive of the United States. So war was declared by 96 men here and 435 men at the other end of the Capitol, and those men, 531 all told, sent more than 4,000,000 American soldiers into the conflict.

Those soldiers paid. The 531 here did not pay, nor can they ever pay. It is the 4,000,000 they sent into battle who paid, and they will continue to pay, and pay, and pay, and pay, many of them so long as they live, and many thousands have already paid with their lives in answer to that fateful declaration.

Is there anyone here who can not be grateful to these lads? I saw them march away. They did not make the war. They were not responsible for the war. It was their duty to preserve this Nation, to give substance to this building in which we stand, to make possible the perpetuity of this Government of ours with their lives, if need be, and they were cheered as they went out to battle.

All along the route I saw them, in various cities through which they passed. I had the honor to be among them. Flags were out, business men along the sidewalks, capitalists everywhere, banners waving.

"Ah, what heroic action is yours," they said. "The great deeds you are about to do! What an honor it is. We will save your jobs, and when you return to this enormously grateful Republic we will welcome you with open arms. Your jobs will be waiting for you here, aye, and with promotions."

So they marched off to war, with its death and destruction. I saw this little army march along Pennsylvania Avenue the other night, ragged, after 16 years had passed, many of them without enough to eat. Some thousands of them here, representing other hundreds of thousands, have come on here to ask this grateful Republic to keep them from starving. They were herded together and practically told they were unwanted here. Who has a better right than they to be in this city, which, had it not been for them, would not exist to-day as the Capital of the greatest Republic on the face of the globe? Who better than they have a right to come to this Capital? Who better than they?

Is that the glory, the honor, the promotion, which they were promised 15 years ago, when, with an excess of fervor and patriotic devotion, they marched out yonder to where this body and the body at the other end of the Capitol had consigned them?

Then there are Members of Congress, according to the press, who slip around in some slimy fashion, so that their names will not be used, and who are so utterly lost to decency as to have the temerity and audacity to suggest that the chief of police of this city should be replaced; that General Glassford, himself a veteran, who has been doing his best to feed these boys, to protect them from the weather, and see that they do not die of disease—that for so doing that man should be discharged from his position, that an efficient officer should lose his place.

God save the mark, Mr. President, what are we coming to when things like these can happen 15 years after these same lads went off to war, with the cheers of a grateful people ringing in their ears?

Fifteen years! It seems as if it were but yesterday. We were a happy people then. We were contented. We were in the midst of peace. We had been kept out of war. It is true the conflict raged on all sides. Other nations were engaged, but not we, thank God.

Parents of children in this country congratulated themselves and the land of their fathers that they were not involved in this bloodshed as were other nations. Peace and plenty there were. The host of 4,000,000 and more had not been called into action thus far. Life was sweet to them. They lived here. They had places to work. Many of them were in college and high school. They enjoyed life. Suddenly it was all changed. They were plunged into the vortex of horror and catastrophe as only war can bring about horror and catastrophe. I repeat for emphasis that it was by action of the Chief Executive, the Senate of the United States, and the House of Representatives at the other end of the Capitol, 531 men, that those boys and young men were sent into war.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The Senator has placed considerable emphasis upon the fact that a President was reelected on the ground that he had kept us out of war.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. That is true.

Mr. TRAMMELL. And that then shortly after his next term began we entered the war.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. True.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Had there not been events which arose and occurred between the time of his reelection and the declaration of war that emphasized the necessity for the country to enter the war?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I know of none. I do not care to be diverted into a political discussion; but I will say to the Senator in answer to his question that none arose between the election in November and February, when the declaration became a reality.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The situation became more desperate. The Senator said he is not going to enter into a political discussion. Why, then, did he make reference to it? It has nothing to do with the merits of this proposition.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I made reference to it for this reason, and this alone, that those lads themselves had nothing to do with the making of the war. They were dragged into it. They were forced into it. They had every reason to believe, as indeed the world had every reason to believe, there would be no war. Placards and billboards stared them in the face all over the United States, with the picture of the then President of the United States, with pictures of mothers with their children in their arms, with the slogan, the legend, attached thereto, "He kept us out of war! He kept us out of war!"

That was kept up until November of 1916. Relying on those placards, those billboards, those statements from orators on the platform all over the country, mothers and fathers went to the polls and pledged their faith in those statements and that man with their votes. That candidate was elected and three months afterwards—in February, before that very candidate, the successful candidate, successful largely because of the placards and the billboards and those statements to which I have referred, was inaugurated on March 4, the country was at war and those 4,000,000 men were being marshalled together.

That is what I said. It was from the White House and the Capitol here that those 4,000,000 men were sent to war; and now they are back here in rags, marching through the streets, not wanted, some people and even Congressmen practically intimating that they ought to leave the Capital—this Capital which they preserved and glorified.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield, though that is as much as I care to say about politics.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I would like to inquire if the Senator does not think that the merits of the claim of the ex-service men of this country are sufficient within themselves upon which to base a support of the pending bill without the necessity of retreating to all character of abuse of those in authority who had anything to do with the declaration of war?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. O Mr. President, I know, but the point I wanted to make, and to make clear, the point which I hope will sink into the consciousness of everybody here, of everybody in the United States, and even into the consciousness of the Senator from Florida himself, is that those who make war do not pay for war. They who pay for war are those who bare their breasts to the enemy and fight, those who die, those whose widows and orphans throughout the land are now appealing to us, and those who are maimed and wounded. They are the ones who pay for war, not those in authority.

But those in authority can pay the living something. Those in authority can keep the living from starving to death. Those in authority can see that the living have decent clothing to wear. Those in authority can protect the widows and orphans of those who bore the brunt of battle. Those in authority can see to it that these returned veterans either have jobs or money with which to buy food which they now lack. That is the point I wanted to make.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I much prefer not to be diverted by the Senator.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The Senator has been in the Senate for a number of years. Has he ever proposed any other means than that which exists under the Federal Constitution for the declaration of war?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I do not care to go into that question at all. I am dealing with historical facts which the Senator will not gainsay or deny.

Mr. President, we were happy then. Sixteen years have passed. During the past 10 years we have seen make their appearance in this fair land of ours, silently and solemnly, some 63 hospitals, to be found in every State of the Union. Those 63 institutions which have appeared since 1919, with 150,000 beds, all occupied, and with long waiting lists, have hospitalized more than 1,500,000 of these veterans, practically one-third of those who answered the call in 1917. One million five hundred thousand! Think of it! So frightful is war to-day, so terrific, with tremendous engines of mass destruction, with gas and chemicals on all sides, that in those 10 fateful years more than 1,500,000 cases have been hospitalized in those 63 institutions.

We are informed by experts that the peak of disability shall not have been reached until 1945. That means, if it means anything, that in the next 13 years other thousands and hundreds of thousands of these lads who now think they are sound, who feel strong and healthy, will have entered those grim portals—so fearful, so terrific, is war to-day. That is the price we pay for war. But when nations go to war they must expect to pay the price forever and anon, over and over again. One of the early statements I made was that unfortunately those who make war do not pay for war.

That does not half tell the story, Mr. President. According to conservative figures, it cost this country in treasure alone $100,000,000,000. Not only that, but we left 60,000 dead in France. All over this country others have passed on to the great beyond, lads who answered the call. It is too late for the Congress to give them any bonus. They are gone. It is too late for Congress even to begin to pay them anything in dollars and cents for the heroic sacrifice they made. It was the supreme sacrifice. They are gone. Only their widows and orphans remain. Their comrades in various veterans' organizations are petitioning us to see that they are taken care of. There has been a bill pending in the Senate for more than a month which has never been permitted to see the light of day which only undertakes to do some small measure of justice to widows and orphans of those who gave their lives.

Mr. President, as soon as the war was over the railroads came to Congress and said that their incomes had suffered during the war; that they required hundreds of millions of dollars in bonuses, in readjusted earnings, to make them square with the world. That was mentioned a moment ago by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART]. Congress enacted legislation immediately to pay that bonus to the railroads, hundreds of millions of dollars in cash. There was no suggestion that they wait until 1945. It was cash.

Then the civilian employees of the Government came in and suggested that they had refrained from taking larger earnings which the war time afforded and they ought to be reimbursed and have their earnings readjusted to some degree. Congress immediately said that was right. I have no quarrel with this action, Mr. President. If I had been here I think I should have voted as a majority of my colleagues here and over in the other body voted. But the point is that they were paid cash. They were not asked to wait until 1945.

Contractors who had built cantonments all over the land came in and said, "Listen! You closed the war too soon for us. You quit fighting. These boys over there stopped this job of ours. They went over and did their work too well. They ended the war." I say with everlasting pride that they did end it shortly after they got there. That was the job they had to do, and they did it well. But the contractors of the country were making tremendous profits out of their sacrifice. I do not blame them particularly for having the contracts—some one had to do the work—but the point is that they were here in safety; they were never over there entrenched in mud, going without enough to eat, stopping bullets for $30 a month, for $1 a day. They were here in safety. They said, in effect, "The job was done too quickly and too efficiently over there. It is ended now and here we are. We have these contracts and it is going to cost us some money. We need a bonus. We need adjusted compensation." What did Congress do? Congress immediately paid it. They were not asked to wait until 1945. They were paid cash on the spot.

About that time bitter experiences were tasted by some of these lads who had gone over there, our great Army of 4,000,000 men—2,000,000 men over there and 2,000,000 men over here—and I give equal credit and equal honor to all of them. The boys over here were anxious to go over there, and had their presence been needed over there they would have been there. They served where they were told to serve and deserve great honor and credit for it. These men had all returned and many found their jobs which had been promised them were gone. The promises which had been made to them did not materialize. In fact, they found themselves in needy economic circumstances, badly off, attempting to rehabilitate themselves; and many of them have been badly off ever since. Many of them have never been rehabilitated. God have compassion on thousands and hundreds of thousands of them, for they never can be rehabilitated, Mr. President, in this world; it is too late. But, strangely enough, they looked around for the glory that was promised them, and even that was conspicuous by its absence. The man with a wooden leg or with no leg at all seeking money to buy a leg for one which was shot off on Flanders field, a man sightless, earless, noseless, and the friends and the family of the man who was mentally dark and blind wondered about the glory part of it—"where is the glory?"

It is rather common for those who have never seen war and never been in it to say of the veterans, "Why, the country does not owe them a cent; it is perfectly all right; what an honor and privilege it is to serve one's country!" I wonder how many there are among those who make war—those who make war and do not pay for it—who would like to go and accept some of its glory at $30 a month—a dollar a day—with little hope of continued existence in this world?

The lads who have come here are proud men. I said on this floor day before yesterday the lads in this so-called bonus army are not here because they want to be here; they are here because this is the Capital of the Nation, and here sit those in charge, for the moment, at any rate, of the destiny of the Nation. They make their appeal to them in person, that we may see their rags, that we may see their suffering, that we may to some extent realize something of their misery. That is the only reason they are here.

So these lads, proud, and their families—proud Americans all—finally—tardily, it seems to me, for I have always felt this readjustment should have come as soon as the war was over—in 1924 asked for the passage of a bill, erroneously called the bonus bill. And in the end Congress said, "That is right; you are entitled to it, you are entitled to some compensation, to some readjustment, and this is the way we are going to readjust your compensation." Listen to this—this is the job Congress did in 1924. "We have looked around to see what the lowest-paid labor received during the war, and we find that to be about $60 a month. You received a dollar a day, and $1 a day added to it, making $2 a day—or $1.25 added to it, if you saw service overseas—will just about bring your compensation up to what the lowest-paid laborer received during the war. But," they added—listen—"because of the fact that you have rendered this patriotic service we are going to ask you to wait until 1945; then if you are still living, we will pay you." [Laughter in the galleries.]

The VICE PRESIDENT rapped with his gavel.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. "It is true," said the Congress, "we paid the railroads cash; we did not ask them to wait until 1945; it is true," said Congress, "that we readjusted the compensation of civilian employees and paid them cash; we did not ask them to wait until 1945. It is true we readjusted the earnings of the contractors of the country because the war ended too soon and they needed the money. We paid them cash; we did not ask them to wait until 1945. But, as to you boys, now that we are readjusting your compensation, at any rate in theory and in principle, we say that the dollar a day you received with a dollar added to it will just bring your pay up to what was paid the lowest-paid laborers during the war; that ought to be satisfactory to you for the present and we will pay you in 1945."

I say that debt should have been paid at once. It was a debt, Mr. President; it was not a bonus. It is not due in 1945. It was due the day the armistice was signed; indeed, it was due, if due at all, as the service was being rendered.

I hesitate to mention that to which I am about to refer. Perhaps the Senator from Florida can get some comfort from it. I understand the present Secretary of the Treasury made the statement the other day—I hope he did not make it; I hope he has been misquoted, but I have been informed that he made the statement that these soldiers are asking for a debt that is not due until 1945 to be paid with dishonest money. I hope he never made that statement. Never was any statement falser than that. The debt was due the day the armistice was signed, if it was due at all; and the soldiers do not want it paid in dishonest money. They want it paid in honest money, the coin of the realm, with the majesty and the honor of the United States Government behind it. That is what they want and nothing less than that.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The Senator refers to me because I resented his criticism of the then President of the United States at the time of the declaration of war, and his severe criticism of the Members of Congress at that time. Now he asks me a question with regard to a member of his own party, the Secretary of the Treasury. I will say that I am not his keeper; I hold no brief for him, and if he said anything of that kind I do not agree with him.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I hope the Secretary of the Treasury has too much sense of common decency to have made any such statement as he has been quoted as having made. I read in the newspapers that the same authority was purported to have said when he was asked as to what would be done about the bonus, that it might be paid with the foreign debts when those debts should be collected. I hope he did not make that statement either, Mr. President; neither statement is worthy of him.

We passed a law in 1924 acknowledging the debt but postponing until 1945 its payment. The then Chief Executive of the United States vetoed that law; and Congress, by that time evidently seeing that there was tremendous ground for the payment of this obligation, had to pass it over his veto. Since then, Mr. President, things have gone on from bad to worse, until many thousands of the veterans of the World War have marched here to Washington asking justice of the Congress which recently sent them to war. I repeat that again and again. The Congress has lost nothing through the war, except as the whole world has lost, as the whole world always loses when war comes. The veterans are asking Congress now at this belated moment to pay this debt.

I understand many of the powers in Wall Street are opposed to it; big business in many places is opposed to it; they say that the Budget must be balanced. Why, Mr. President, it seems to me to be elementary that, with a debt of more than $2,000,000,000, due and unpaid, a debt that was due on November 11, 1918, hanging over the head of the Government, the Budget can not be balanced; with that arrearage there can be no balancing until the debt is paid; and the best way to balance the Budget is to pay the debt owed and get even and square with the board, and at the same time do justice.

Mr. President, war is a terrible thing. When two nations go to war it is, on a gigantic scale, just the same as two men fighting a duel with pistols pointed at each other's heart. One may die; both may die. A nation fights through its young men, not so much through its capital, for, Mr. President, capital always takes care of itself; a million dollars can always protect itself. That leads me to suggest, though, that capital might well be conscripted in time of war, and thus make its contribution to the general cause, and certainly the war profits of the profiteers should all be conscripted.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I can not help interrupting the Senator's elequent address to make a suggestion in line with what he has just said. The greatest contribution that could possibly be made to world peace would be to do just what the Senator has said, namely, in time of war to make capital stand its share. Then there would be no more war.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Try to do it, and you will find out yonder the lobbyists in force representing big business. Do Members of the Congress suggest that they go home, that they are not entitled to be here, that they are not allowed to remain in the Nation's capital?

Mr. NORRIS. We had such people here when the declaration was made that put us into the World War.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Beyond any question of a doubt that is so. They scented big money.

Mr. President, I was just observing that when two nations go to war it is just the same as two men fighting a duel; one may die; we have seen them die. But the young men must save not only the honor of their country and the glory and majesty of its flag but the young men must defend the women and children of the country or the country perishes; it goes the way of all flesh. Mr. President, the best way to assure the preservation of a nation is for that nation to be grateful and considerate to those who have defended it in time of peril.

The great Russian Empire at the beginning of the World War ranked second proudly among all the nations of the earth. It is to-day a memory; dead, turned to dust, never again to return to its pristine glory. Other governments may come and go, but that government is dead. The great Austro-Hungarian Empire is dead; the great German Empire is dead; the great Turkish Empire is dead; Montenegro is dead, wiped off the map. Our children of to-day do not know, at any rate from the geographies, that such countries ever existed. Those governments are dead, all due to war; all dead; we saw these great nations die.

The earth is filled with turmoil and misery, and this condition is the direct aftermath of the World War.

But America lives. Mr. President, I want this great country of ours never to die; I want it to go on. I want the children coming on to have faith in this country; that they may be glad to volunteer to go out and serve it in time of desperate need; that it may live on and on and on and never die.

Mr. President, the average age of these veterans is 38. They have not yet been rehabilitated. I say let the United States Government give them jobs, which they would like to have, or else give them money with which to buy food, to which they are entitled. They are the saviors of the land and the flag, who made it possible for the Government to endure. By so doing, by passing this bill, by doing this tardy justice to the defenders of America, we will have been true to our traditions; we shall have taken a great step forward and onward and upward to the fulfillment of our glorious destiny; and all our people will be happy in the knowledge that this Republic is grateful.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana is right in one respect. The adjusted compensation was a graveyard settlement. The settlement ought never to have been made in the manner in which it was made.

I was a Member of the House at the time, and proposed a cash settlement as the best kind of settlement, because the men needed the money then. They had recently returned from the war. They were out of employment; and it would have been a graceful act for the Nation to have finally settled the matter in one enactment of the Congress. I introduced a bill for a cash settlement, and spoke for it. So to that extent I believe the patriotic Senator from Indiana is right.

But my mind goes back to the period of the war, to the men who enlisted and the men who volunteered. It was a fight by the whole Nation. I remember my own family, the women in it knitting socks, collecting money, serving as nurses; and we must think of those women now. We must think of those who bore many diverse burdens during the war.

Again we have reached in our history a period of great distress, a period of trial, a period that is straining the nerves and the courage of the Nation. During the war we mobilized industry. We lent money to the world. We voluntarily accepted a great burden of taxation; and now once again the Nation is in distress. Everybody must make sacrifices at this time. Everyone must carry his portion of the load of uncertainty and lack of occupation. It does not seem to me that the time has yet arrived when, because men served in the Army, we should forget the women back home; and we should not forget the other elements that contributed during the war.

I think of the family as a unit. I think my experience was about that of every other man—that is to say, that every male in the family volunteered, either in my home State of Missouri or back in my native State of Kentucky. They did their share, and the women all did their share.

Now, when we are cutting down the salaries of all of our Federal employees, when we are cutting down hospitalization, when we are cutting off supplies for welfare boards, when long lines of men are out of employment in the cities, when the President of the United States and the Senate and the Congress and the governors of States are trying to bring about a proper balance, it seems to me the soldier boys should wait a while. Let them have the same spirit and the same courage that they had when they went into the war. Let us wait until the clouds of distress roll by. Let us think not of one class of our people but of all classes of our people.

We have sympathy for these men. They have been orderly, they have been kindly, they have been peaceful in coming here and asking for the immediate payment of their insurance; but we do not know what distress granting their request would bring to the rest of the country, and we must consider all of the country and not part of the country, all of our people not part of them.

I certainly agree with the Senator from Indiana that the original settlement was a poor settlement. It was what I called it on the floor of Congress, a graveyard settlement. It was not judiciously done; but it has been done, and to-day I think the Senate in voting upon this bill must think not only of one class of our citizens but of all classes of our citizens.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAWES. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. They come from every home in the land. There is not a single home in America that was not touched by the war or that did not have some one close to the members of that family in the war; so it is not a question of a special class. They come from every single part of the country.

Mr. HAWES. I tried to inform the Senator how it affected my own home. It left my country place without a man on it, and of course it hit every home. But the main thing to-day is to get over this economic depression and to do it bravely, unitedly. I should like to have every soldier take that thought back home and think, as he did in the days of the war, of America again in distress, and with patience wait a while.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Mr. ASHURST presented a letter in the nature of a memorial from the Nogales (Ariz.) Chamber of Commerce, remonstrating against the passage of legislation to increase the tariff duties on commodities entering the United States from countries having depreciated currencies, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a telegram from Dan J. Lyons, commander of Morgan McDermott Post, the American Legion, Tucson, Ariz., stating that that post went on record "instructing delegates to our next State convention to favor immediate payment of the bonus," etc., which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from Frank A. Thackery, Oatman, Ariz., praying for the inclusion of a $50,000 item for an experimental station at Fort Mohave in the public improvement or unemployment relief measures, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COPELAND presented a resolution adopted by members of Waterproof Garment Workers' Union, Local No. 20, International League of Garment Workers' Union, New York City, N. Y., protesting against the passage of the bill (H. R. 12044) to provide for the exclusion and expulsion of alien communists, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Cazenovia, N. Y., praying for the ending of national prohibition and the levying of taxes on the liquor traffic, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Brooklyn and vicinity, in the State of New York, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Patman bill, providing for the immediate payment to veterans of the face value of their adjusted-service certificates, which was ordered to lie on the table.

EXTERMINATION OF GRASSHOPPERS

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD several telegrams which have to do with an appropriation which was passed by the Senate on four different occasions, and is now before a conference committee of the House and the Senate. These telegrams refer to an appropriation inserted by the Senate in the agricultural appropriation bill to be used to fight the grasshopper menace in the Northwest. For the information of the conferees, I ask to have the telegrams printed.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HON. ARTHUR M. HYDE,
Secretary of Agriculture,
Morrison Hotel, Chicago, Ill.:

Letters and telegrams coming from Northwest telling of tremendous hatching of grasshoppers. Your letter of June 10 to Congressman JAMES P. BUCHANAN influenced the House of Representatives in killing appropriation intended to be used to stop impending devastation of crops of Northwest. Bureau of Entomology informed me to-day that if funds can be made available this week it will still not be too late for effective use. If you will withdraw letter to Mr. BUCHANAN and back the Department of Entomology with another letter favoring an appropriation another effort will be made to obtain funds for this work.

HENRIK SHIPSTEAD.

CHICAGO, ILL.

Senator HENRIK SHIPSTEAD:

Present information does not justify change in department's attitude regarding grasshoppers as expressed letter to Buchanan.

ARTHUR M. HYDE,
Secretary Department of Agriculture.

Senator HENRIK SHIPSTEAD,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Supplementing telegram, 14th, sent Secretary Hyde, Speaker GARNER, and Congressman ANDRESEN, we have further investigated grasshopper situation. Can report that Minnesota can and will take care of situation in Minnesota without Federal aid. We are equally certain that funds are needed immediately for North and South Dakota and Montana. Even a week's delay would probably necessitate much larger amount. If $500,000 could be immediately available for these three States, we believe situation can be satisfactorily handled. Legal situation in these States makes immediate appropriations impossible, and financial condition of counties involved is such that funds could not be raised for immediate use anyway. Arrangements will be made to advance money if we can have Government's assurance that we will be reimbursed. Please address E. W. Decker, Northwestern National Bank, Minneapolis.

PROHIBITION OF SOVIET IMPORTS

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, in behalf of a large number of patriotic, civic, and business organizations I had the honor of presenting a petition to the Hon. Ogden L. Mills, Secretary of the Treasury, on March 15, 1932, for the enforcement of section 307 of the tariff act of 1930 against Soviet imports.

At the time this petition was presented there were approximately 100 names of organizations attached. Since then other organizations have expressed their desire to support this petition and this movement for the prohibition of Soviet imports. I ask permission that the petition as signed by all of the organizations to date, together with the brief reply of Secretary Mills of March 23, 1932, be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the matter indicated was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PETITION FOR THE ENFORCEMENT OF SECTION 307 OF THE TARIFF ACT OF 1930, AGAINST SOVIET PRODUCTS

MARCH 15, 1932.

Hon. OGDEN L. MILLS,
Secretary of the Treasury, Treasury Department,
Washington, D. C.

MR. SECRETARY: We desire to submit for your consideration certain facts and observations relating to the importation into the United States of articles produced by convict or forced labor in the Soviet Union, together with extracts from the constitution, laws and decrees in force in that country, and other evidence of the practices of the Soviet régime, all of which have a direct bearing on the enforcement of section 37 of the tariff act of 1930.

The department has been advised by representatives of labor and agriculture, manufacturers, and producers of raw materials, individually and collectively, that imports produced under the conditions of virtual slavery which exist in the Soviet Union are a serious menace to many branches of industry and agriculture in the United States. The Treasury Department is also aware that for years past patriotic societies, separately and together, have painstakingly investigated and established by unimpeachable evidence the true nature of the economic system which prevails within the boundaries of the U. S. S. R. It is the belief of all these organizations that American political and economic institutions are imperiled as a result of the commercial war which is being waged by the dictatorship in Moscow upon all civilized society.

In the light of these facts, and particularly in light of the position taken by the United States concerning the recognition of the soviet régime, we can not believe that the Treasury Department will dispute the fact that section 307 of the tariff act of 1930 was enacted to protect American industry from the competition of forced labor as that term applies to conditions of labor in Soviet Russia. The intent of the statute is clear upon this point.

The existence of forced labor throughout Russia is a matter of general and common knowledge. Communism or state socialism as it exists in Russia involves unified economic effort and makes complete and rigid control over all economic activity essential. This is not a matter of dispute. It is a fundamental element and well-known principle of the soviet system.

We may expect to find evidence of this policy in the constitution and laws of Soviet Russia. Article 9 of the constitution declares that labor is a duty of all citizens. Article 61 of the criminal code makes refusal to perform compulsory services or to carry out work of national importance a criminal offense. Article 11 of chapter 3 of the labor code provides that where there is a deficiency of labor for the execution of important state tasks all citizens may be called to labor duty by a special resolution of the Council of Peoples Commissars. This is the basic law of the Soviet Union and its constituent republics. No one will dispute the fact that the 5-year plan of the U. S. S. R. is the "important state task" provided by the laws.

Abundant evidence of the active and effective enforcement of these laws relating to labor is already in the files of the Treasury Department. You also have in your possession a mass of decrees and other pronouncements taken from official Russian sources, a number of which are attached hereto as illustrative exhibits, which definitely establish that "forced labor" in the commonly accepted sense of that term prevails throughout Russia. Therefore there is no need to take time here and now to reexamine this mass of detailed evidence.

It is our belief that the evidence already in the possession of the department establishes that "forced labor," in the commonly accepted sense of that term, is a fundamental part of the soviet system. Any evidence secured hereafter could do no more than corroborate the evidence which already is in the possession of the department. It is improbable that the Treasury Department will be able to secure any facts relating to specific shipments of soviet products. It may, therefore, be reasonably concluded that the question of whether or not section 307 is an effective bar against the products of "forced labor" as it exists in Russia rests on facts already before the department and must be decided upon the basis of these facts.

We are not asking that the Treasury Department declare its views as to the desirability or undesirability of excluding soviet products under section 307. We are asking whether, under section 307, the intent of Congress to exclude the products of "forced labor" will be effectively enforced against the products of that country. We assert, in that connection, that all the facts are now before the department and that a prompt decision as to the action which the department intends to take should be rendered. If you believe the law is defective, it is our purpose to urge the enactment of effective legislation. We are hopeful that the decision of the Treasury Department will make this unnecessary.

This is a matter of deep and vital interest to the patriotic societies interested in the future welfare of the United States, as well as to American labor and American industry. If you, as the executive officer of the Government charged with the enforcement of the tariff act, are of the opinion that you do not have the means of enforcing section 307 against soviet products, we ask a definite statement to that effect so that we can then present the matter to Congress for the necessary legislative action for the protection of American labor and industry from this ruinous and unfair competition and for the preservation of our economic, political, and social institutions.

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, March 23, 1932.

MY DEAR SENATOR ODDIE: In view of the statement made by me at the hearing with reference to section 307 of the tariff act of 1930, in so far as it affects importations from Russia, it was not thought that a further reply was required to the petition filed by you and your associates. I understand, however, that you desire a further reply.

Section 307 forbids the importation of all goods, wares, articles, and merchandise mined, produced, or manufactured, wholly or in part, in any foreign country by convict labor or/and forced labor or/and indentured labor under penal sanctions.

"Forced labor" is defined as follows:

"All work or service which is exacted from any person under the menace of any penalty for its nonperformance and for which the worker does not offer himself voluntarily."

For the purpose of administering this section of the law the Treasury Department has adopted regulations, a copy of which is inclosed. It will be noted that these regulations in effect place the burden of proof on the importer to show that the goods offered for entry were not produced by forced labor, as defined by the statute. However, in the few cases which have already risen it is apparent that the importer has no difficulty in sustaining the burden placed on him and in rebutting any presumption in the absence of evidence to the contrary. And, in view of the fact that the Treasury Department has no means of investigating conditions of production in Soviet Russia, evidence rebutting the presumption created by the affidavits of the shippers and importers can not well be produced. It should further be noted that in carrying out this or any other law the Treasury Department can not act without the necessary evidence. Its decisions are reviewable by the courts. The customs courts have almost uniformly accepted affidavits of importers and shippers, and in the absence of evidence rebutting the presumption created by these affidavits the position taken by the Treasury is not supported by the court.

To date there have been 12 shipments offered for entry as to which the provisions of section 307 might have applied. In every one of these cases apparently authentic affidavits were offered by the importers in accordance with the regulations of the Treasury Department. In every one of these cases there was no evidence available to rebut the presumption created by the affidavits, and accordingly the Treasury Department was bound to admit the goods.

In the petition presented by you on March 15 the position is taken that "the existence of forced labor throughout Russia is a matter of general and common knowledge," and that "it is our belief that the evidence already in the possession of the department establishes that forced labor, in the commonly accepted sense of that term, is a fundamental part of the soviet system." Or, in other words, it is held in the petition that all labor in Russia is forced labor, and that section 307 should be so interpreted as to include all goods, wares, articles, and merchandise mined, produced, or manufactured wholly or in part in Soviet Russia.

As I stated at the meeting on March 15, if in writing section 307 the Congress intended that its definition of "forced labor" should be broad enough to include all labor in the Union of Soviet Republics, then I submit that the Congress should say so in so many words. There is not in this department the legal evidence necessary to establish the fact that all labor in Soviet Russia is forced labor, as defined in the present law, and if all labor is not forced labor, then the question must inevitably arise when an individual cargo is offered for entry whether that individual cargo was or was not produced by forced labor; and when that question arises we are confronted with the situation above described.

Very truly yours,

OGDEN L. MILLS,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. TASKER L. ODDIE,
United States Senate.

GRASSHOPPER PLAGUE IN THE NORTHWEST

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD letters and wires from prominent people in my State in reference to the grasshopper menace and ask that they may lie on the table. Also a clipping from the Minneapolis Tribune.

The situation is extreme and demands immediate action. The prospects are for the best crop of years estimated at a billion. If this small relief does not come now, it means wide destruction not only of the farmers but the business of the entire Northwest. I can not urge too strongly the need of immediate action. No greater service of the Government can be rendered than an appropriation now to relieve the pending devastation. Poison bran will do the job, and surely our Government can not stand by and see this scourge and raise not a finger to deter it. Minnesota has appropriated $100,000 and needs $150,000 more. North Dakota needs $400,000, and South Dakota needs $500,000.

There being no objection, the matters referred to were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senator THOMAS SCHALL,
National Capitol:

Commercial Club, village of Graceville, urges you to make every effort for passage of bill for poison grasshopper bait.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., June 16, 1932.

The Hon. THOMAS D. SCHALL,
United States Senator:

While I am strongly in favor Government retrenchment, believe you should use every effort favoring legislation necessary to furnishing adequate relief for grasshopper prevention in Northwest. Situation rapidly growing worse.

JOHN H. STICKNEY.

Hon. THOMAS D. SCHALL,
United States Senator:

Representing 2,000 retail hardware merchants, we urge you to work for financial aid to fight grasshoppers in the Northwest.

MINNESOTA AND SOUTH DAKOTA RETAIL HARDWARE ASSOCIATIONS.

Washington:

The impending disaster to our agricultural interests from the grasshopper invasion is now so plainly apparent that our organization is keenly aroused to the necessity of our National Government coming immediately to the rescue of our farmers, and for that reason we appeal to you to lend every effort on your part that this shall be brought about.

CARL S. FISCHER,
President Sauk Center Community Club.

Senator THOMAS D. SCHALL,

We are emphatically convinced beyond any question of doubt that immediate action for poison bait to combat grasshopper plague is necessary. There is time to overcome the great danger confronting us at this time. Reports of this hopper menace are so convincing that delay might further endanger the finances of the whole country. Business will suffer if something is not accomplished at once. Feel that this is a national problem.

ST. PAUL, MINN., June 15, 1932.

Hon. Senator THOMAS D. SCHALL,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Don't you think it far more economical to appropriate funds now for poisoning the grasshoppers in the Northwest than to make appropriations next fall for taking care of thousands of farmers at a far greater cost, to say nothing of the suffering?

I personally urge that immediate action be taken to save the Northwest.

Yours very truly,

C. C. GRAY,
President Superior Separator Co.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., June 15, 1932.

Hon. THOMAS D. SCHALL,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR TOM: We in Minnesota are fearful of what is going to happen in the western part of our State, North and South Dakota, and Montana between now and the 15th of July with the grasshopper pest. Unless action is begun at once we will lose the harvesting on one of the best crops we have had in a number of years, and if such a catastrophe happens I do not know what the farmers of this country and the people living in the Twin Cities will do.

We all beg of you to get action on this appropriation for extermination at once.

Very truly yours, SPRADLIN MOTHPROOF CORP.,
By S. C. CONFER.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., June 15, 1932.

Hon. THOMAS D. SCHALL,
Senator, State of Minnesota, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR SCHALL: We can insure the prosperity of the Northwest this fall at a low rate of $1 per thousand.

The impending grasshopper scourge threatens to imperil our billion-dollar crop, the first we have had in years. If immediate action is not taken, thousands of farmers will be left without sufficient food for themselves and livestock. We shall have prospects of bare fields, gaunt cattle, and a pall of gloom over the land. Deserted farms, vacated stores, closed banks will be in evidence, and thousands of men and women will give way to despair.

Last year the Red Cross fed 40,000 farmers in the two Dakotas. One-half of the farmers in North Dakota were compelled to borrow from the Government this spring to buy their seed. If we do not meet this emergency, there shall be no harvest; there will be more appeals to the Red Cross; more relief funds requested from the Government, with complete stagnation throughout the Northwest.

Congress has been misinformed regarding this emergency, and there is still time to remedy this disastrous mistake. Poison bait is instantly available to be spread where needed, and we have until the middle of July to fight this impending plague.

Are you willing to act immediately and appropriate $1,500,000 to save our crop? The result of your action will mean either prosperity or despair.

Yours truly,

A. G. DELANY.

P. S.—This is the Government's opportunity to make the people of this district self-sustaining or force them to accept a dole. Surely the latter course is obnoxious to every self-respecting citizen.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., June 15, 1932.

Hon. THOMAS D. SCHALL,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As you, of course, know we in the Northwest are faced with a calamity and we urgently request your assistance.

We now have the prospects of a bountiful crop—if the grasshoppers do not get it first.

The help we are requesting from you is that you work for an adequate financial appropriation from Congress to defray the cost of sufficient poison bait to check the spread of these grasshoppers.

A comparatively small expenditure at this time will return big dividends to the Northwest if we can arrest this disaster.

We wish to assure you we shall certainly appreciate any effort you put forth toward helping this cause along.

Yours very truly,

THE ST. ANTHONY & DAKOTA ELEVATOR CO.,
H. E. MILLER, Secretary.

KONDON MANUFACTURING CO.,
Minneapolis, Minn., June 15, 1932.

Senator THOMAS D. SCHALL,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: We want you to act quick in helping to do something about the grasshopper menace up here in the Northwest. You need not answer this letter, but act on the subject of getting an appropriation through for a small amount of money to save our billion-dollar crop up here in the Northwest which we need badly.

Sincerely yours, T. N. KENYON.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., June 15, 1932.

Hon. THOMAS D. SCHALL,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: Having an intimate knowledge of conditions in the Northwest we are greatly concerned with your attitude toward an appropriation for poison bait to combat the grasshopper plague.

Grasshoppers by the millions are crawling out of the sod in the States of North Dakota, South Dakota, Minnesota, and Montana. We have a billion-dollar crop in sight, the first real crop we have had in years, and unless Congress takes immediate steps to appropriate funds for this purpose our crop will be ruined, more farmers will be bankrupt, additional banks closed, and men and women—the backbone of our Government—will give up in despair.

As the Northwest crop is of vital importance to our country in general, we sincerely urge you to use your best efforts in protecting this crop.

Assuring you that your cooperation will be greatly appreciated, we are

Yours very respectfully,

LAMPERT LUMBER CO.,
Per H. C. MERMAN.

[From the Minneapolis (Minn.) Tribune]

The above picture tells, more graphically than words, the dire peril that threatens the billion dollar crop of the Northwest.

The grasshopper, numbered by billions, with an insatiable appetite, is crawling out of the sod of North Dakota, South Dakota, Minnesota, and Montana.

He is still wingless. He can only move a few feet in a day. Soon he will develop his jumping legs, and his limit of movement will increase. Later he will grow wings and a voracious appetite.

Once he has wings he can mount thousands of feet into the air. He can fly with the winds hundreds of miles in all directions. He can come down in thick clouds on fields and strip them clean of vegetation in a few hours.

He can devour our billion-dollar crop, the first we have had in years. He can leave thousands of farmers without enough for food for themselves and their livestock. Last year the Red Cross fed 40,000 farmers in the two Dakotas. One-half the farmers in North Dakota had to borrow from the Government money this spring to buy their seed.

This year the condition of the crops is excellent—either for the grasshoppers or the farmers. If we let the grasshoppers alone there will be no harvest, there will be more appeals to the Red Cross, more money asked from the Government, and stagnation throughout the Northwest.

A million and a half dollars will save our crop. A misinformed Congress neglected to make the necessary appropriation with which to buy poison bait. Congress can still remedy this disastrous mistake. Congress will do so if the Northwest will only speak its mind. Once Congress makes the appropriation, poison bait is instantly available to be spread where needed. We have until the middle of July to fight the grasshopper.

We can insure the prosperity of the Northwest this fall at the low rate of $1 a thousand.

If we do not take this precaution we have every prospect of bare fields, gaunt cattle, and a pall of gloom over the land. Deserted farms, vacant stores, closed banks will greet the eye in every direction. And thousands of men and women, the backbone of our Government and the foundation of our institutions, will give way to despair.

Congress must be made to see the picture as it is. The time to act for every individual, high or low, in the Northwest is now.

Wire your Congressman to get busy.

INDEPENDENT BIMETALLISM OR BOLSHEVISM?

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask leave to have published in the RECORD an article by Hon. Jonathan Bourne, jr., former United States Senator from Oregon, entitled "Independent Bimetallism or Bolshevism?"

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INDEPENDENT BIMETALLISM OR BOLSHEVISM?

The Wheeler bill (S. 2487) providing for the free coinage of silver, as well as gold, at the ratio of 16 to 1, from the economic standpoint is the most important bill that has been introduced in Congress during the present century.

The United States can, should, and will, without the necessitated consent or cooperation of any other nation, remonetize silver on the basis of 16 to 1.

The Wheeler bill (S. 2487) introduced January 4, providing for the free coinage of silver, as well as gold, at the ratio of 16 to 1, is for comprehensiveness, lucidity, and brevity a masterpiece in legislative construction.

From an economic standpoint it is the most important bill that has been introduced in Congress during the present century.

Its enactment into law will do more to extricate the United States and the rest of the world from our present economic and financial chaos than all other suggestions combined. Any plan or bill thus far emanating from our present Executive, members of his Cabinet, Members of Congress, political economists, and so-called captains of big industry are mere makeshifts as compared with the Wheeler bill, S. 2487.

Senator WHEELER's arguments in favor of the enactment of his bill set forth in his speech delivered January 25 in the United States Senate are unanswerable, and his predictions as to the benefits resultant from the enactment of his bill as affecting all classes of our society are most conservative and can not possibly be disproved intelligently by any person.

Nobody thus far has had the temerity to accept Senator WHEELER's challenge, made at the conclusion of his speech, or attempt to disprove the predictions he so clearly sets forth as to the benefits that would result from the enactment of his bill to all classes of our society.

I respectfully urge every reader of this statement to immediately request their Senators and Representatives in Congress to send them a copy of Senator WHEELER's bill, S. 2487, and his speech delivered in the United States Senate on the 25th of January this year. After receipt and careful study of both, the recipient should be impressed, both from the patriotic as well as the selfish viewpoint, that the happiness, contentment, and prosperity of all classes of our society would be restored and cumulatively increased through the enactment of this proposed legislation.

In the study of this question it is well to remember the following fundamental principles:

First. There is no such thing as intrinsic value as is now conceded by all political economists of note. Neither gold, silver, nor any other commodity possesses an intrinsic value.

Second. Legal tender is that currency, circulating medium, or description of money which by law a debtor may offer and a creditor must receive in payment of debts. In fact, it is the life or essence of money and without it good money could not exist.

Third. The volume of money directly affects the market price of all commodities.

Unnatural expansion in volume inevitably results in inflation in market prices with a tendency to speculation.

Unnatural contraction in volume inevitably results in the deflation of market values with resultant financial and economic chaos followed by unhappiness, suffering, and general discontent.

Stability in prices insuring a minimum price that covers a profitable return to labor and capital associated in the joint effort of production is most desirable for the happiness, contentment, occupation, and fair compensation of all classes of our society.

Stability of exchange for the civilized world must be beneficial not only to our own country but to all civilized nations of the world in their intrarelativity.

HISTORICAL FACTS

Accredited records show that since the discovery of America in 1492, down to and including the year 1929, covering a period of over 436 years, there were produced a total for the whole world of 1,041,232,774 fine ounces of gold and 14,729,598,697 fine ounces of silver. In other words, there was a little over thirteen times as many fine ounces of silver produced as there were fine ounces of gold.

Applying our present coinage value (continued under the proposed Wheeler bill) of $20.67 per ounce for fine gold, the total world's production of gold for this over 436-year period has a monetary value of $21,525,005,673, and the total world's production of silver during this period of over 436 years has, under the coining value of our present standard silver dollars $1.29 29/100 per ounce for fine silver (unchanged under the enactment of the Wheeler bill), a value of $19,044,329,616.

In the United States the free coinage of both silver and gold as provided for by the act of 1792 was continued unaltered to 1873, although the ratio between gold and silver coins was changed from 15 to 1 as fixed by the act of 1792 to 16 to 1 by the act of 1834 and to 15.988 to 1 by the act of 1837.

Further note that from and including the years 1801 to 1850 the average gold-silver price ratio was 15.7, while the average silver-gold production ratio for the entire world was 28.0. In other words, although the world's production showed that twenty-eight times as many fine ounces of silver as of fine ounces of gold were produced during that period from 1801 to 1850, yet the relative interchangeability the world over of these two metals was 15.7 ounces of fine silver to 1 ounce of fine gold.

Also note that from the period of 1851 to 1875, both inclusive, the average gold-silver price ratio was 15.5 while the silver-gold production ratio was 6.7. That is to say, during this period although there was only 6.7 times as many fine ounces of silver produced as there were fine ounces of gold yet the relative interchangeability between these two metals throughout the world averaged 15.5 ounces of silver with 1 ounce of gold.

The fact that Great Britain adopted gold monometallism in 1816; France in the 1850's; Germany in 1871, in conjunction with the above-stated average in gold and silver price ratio, together with the world's gold-silver production ratios from 1801 to 1875, prove conclusively the ability of the United States by independent action under the enactment of the Wheeler bill, S. 2487, to maintain the parity of 16 to 1 as provided for in said bill.

These above facts also absolutely disprove any claim that the United States under the enactment of the Wheeler bill would become the dumping ground for the world's silver or that silver—the cheaper metal—would drive out gold—the dearer metal (in the frequent attempted misapplication of the Gresham law) for the reason that neither metal would be cheaper or dearer because of the unlimited demand (compared with nature's limited supply) created for both metals resultant from the free and unlimited coinage of same by the United States Mint at the fixed values for each metal as provided for under the Wheeler bill.

The claim of some of the gold monometallists that China, India, and other nations that for many centuries have only known silver as their financial yardstick, would dump their silver on the market of the United States under the enactment of the Wheeler bill is too absurd and asinine to justify even consideration. Imagine these nations, representing far more than half the population of the civilized world—voluntarily divesting themselves of their only known financial yardstick in their domestic or foreign commerce, thereby necessitating cessation of all domestic business among themselves or foreign business with other nations of the world.

Under what is known as the remonetization of silver on the basis of 16 to 1 the Government does not purchase the silver or the gold. It simply receives the bullion at the mint. After that it is brought to the proper standard of fineness for coins, and if the bullion requires to be refined the Government makes a charge equal to the cost of bringing the metal to standard fineness, that is nine-tenths fine. Then the Government puts its stamp on each piece and turns the coins over to the depositor, and that is all there is to it.

Or the Government may, if it has the coin on hand, at once deliver the coin to the depositor for the bullion; but the Government in no proper sense buys the bullion or does it become the owner of it. The bullion and the coin made from the bullion belong to the depositor.

Separate provision, however, has been made on account of the greater convenience of a paper circulation, for the issue of notes, dollar for dollar, for the coin or bullion which in that case the Government holds in trust for whoever holds the notes or certificates.

In our United States coinage 23.22 grains of fine gold constitute a dollar, namely, $20.67 per fine ounce for gold and 371.25 grains of fine silver constitute a dollar, or $1.29 per ounce for fine silver.

The Wheeler bill adopts the same coinage value by providing under section 3 "The dollar consisting of 25.8 grains of gold nine-tenths fine, or of 412.5 grains of silver nine-tenths fine, shall be the standard unit of value, etc."

For many, many centuries silver and gold have been the only primary money metals of the entire civilized world.

There is no known compilation giving the amount of gold and silver in the world at the present time. On January 1, 1930, the total monetary stock of the principal countries of the world on the basis of $20.67 per ounce of fine gold was $11,072,370,000 and the total silver stock in banks and treasuries at the same time on the basis of $1.29 29/100 per ounce for silver was $4,099,914,000.

The present bullion value of silver in the world's market is approximately 30 cents per ounce. Under the enactment of the Wheeler bill cotemporaneously throughout the civilized world silver would have a minimum value of $1.29 29/100 per ounce and interchangeable with gold throughout the civilized world on the basis of a minimum value of $20.67 per ounce. This would cotemporaneously quadruple the purchasing power of all the silver-standard nations—well over 60 per cent of the civilized world—establish a rigid financial yardstick for international exchange and provide, in my opinion, an unlimited market at a fixed minimum price for all our surplus of raw material and manufactured products of all kinds which would absorb the products of the automobile, electrical, and all other factories for a period of 20 years if run at full capacity, but far greater and more desirable than this, would insure a profitable price to the agriculturists, representing practically 30 per cent of our population, for their products within two years and quadruple the present land values making same desirable collateral instead of undesirable as same have been the past decade or more.

All must concede that our new wealth is produced entirely from the ground and the waters, and unless cost of production and a fair profit are assured we will have no new wealth and ultimately be deprived of the food and sustenance necessary for life itself.

INTERNATIONAL BIMETALLISM

For over 50 years now we have been thrilled or shocked, dependent upon the individual's viewpoint, with rumors of international conferences or international agreements for the remonetization of silver.

Undoubtedly there are many honest advocates of international bimetallism believing that the United States by independent action can not effect a rigid ratio of interchangeability between the two metals.

Historical facts justify the assertion that there are many gold monometallists bitterly opposed to bimetallism not only whether established by international agreement or independent action on the part of the United States, who hypocritically pose as international bimetallists thereby creating a barrage to prevent possible action by the United States alone.

MINE OWNERS APPARENT OPPOSITION TO THE WHEELER BILL, S. 2487

Since Senator WHEELER introduced his bill (S. 2487) on January 4 last and made his very able speech demonstrating the reasons for and benefits that would accrue through its enactment there has been an inexplicable failure on the part of the mine owners themselves to advocate its passage.

Had the individuals controlling the large mining interests of our country immediately rallied to the support of the Wheeler bill (S. 2487) as soon as it was introduced undoubtedly same would ere this have been enacted into law.

Certainly it was reasonably to be expected that both from patriotic and selfish interests this bill should have received such support.

The failure of such a support can only be explained by the following reasons:

First. Possibly because of the large indebtedness to powerful financial interests opposed to bimetallism in any form on the part of some of the large mining companies.

Second. Some of the mining interests while personally favoring the fundamental principles embodied in the Wheeler bill have not believed its enactment possible at this time, and hence, actuated by expediency and the desire for class legislation, as represented in a number of bills thus far introduced in Congress to treat silver, one of their by-products, as a favored commodity, hoping thereby to temporarily, at least, enhance the value of that metal.

A few mine owners and operators express a desire to avoid any odium which may remain from the 1896 W. J. Bryan 16 to 1 campaign, claiming that it would be unfortunate to revive any of the old associations connected with that situation.

This attitude seems to me most untenable. Bryan's nomination in 1896 was due wholly to his speech in the Democratic National Convention advocating the remonetization of silver at 16 to 1. All those now living who participated in that campaign, I think, will agree that 30 days before the election it was generally assumed that Bryan would be elected. I personally know that Mark Hanna himself thought this. I also am reliably informed that $37,000,000 was expended through the national committee under Hanna's leadership to defeat Bryan in the general election.

If at that time the same economic and financial chaos had existed as does to-day unquestionably Bryan would have been elected in 1896 instead of McKinley.

Bryan's subsequent defeats were due primarily to his ceasing to make the remonetization of silver at 16 to 1 the keystone to the foundation of his campaigns and advocating other issues, some of which the voters evidently thought unsound and undesirable.

The fundamental principles embraced under the Wheeler bill (S. 2487) were in no manner originated by Mr. Bryan. For many years before his nomination in 1896 many prominent Republicans had advocated the remonetization of silver by independent action of the United States at the ratio of 16 to 1, such as Speaker Blaine, Senators Teller, Wolcott, Jones, Stewart, Congressman McKinley, and many others.

In the United States to-day there are probably now living over a million of the old Bryan Democrats, silver Republicans, and Populists who were politically active in the 1896 campaign. These are all vitalizing agencies well scattered over the country who would not have to be educated as to the desirability and necessity of the enactment of the Wheeler bill.

With due appreciation of the ability, ingenuity, and much valuable information contained in the various bills which have been introduced and plans which have been suggested to the country by Senators PITTMAN and DILL and Messrs. Brownell, Leon, and Channing I assert that they are all fundamentally unsound and do not at all reach the crux of the question in stabilizing exchange between the silver standard and gold standard nations. They contemplate class legislation presumably in favor of the mine owners. Take, for instance, the Brownell plan. If adopted, it would unquestionably for some time to come increase the bullion value of silver in the United States, Mexico, Canada, and Australia, the four countries whose cooperation is contemplated under such plan if adopted. This plan would also increase in other countries the bullion value of silver to the extent that the supplies of the four countries covered under same were taken out of the world's market but under the Brownell and these other plans gold only is treated as a primary metal while silver is discriminated against as a temporarily favored commodity. Gold would remain at $20.67 per ounce as measured by itself but still steadily, though not as rapidly as at present, increase in value in its exchangeability for all other commodities.

Gold would have an unlimited demand, compared with nature's limited supply, created for it in its monetary use at a fixed price, while silver would have a limited demand created for it in its partial monetary use at a fluctuating price dependent upon the world's bullion value of silver.

For over 55 years I have been somewhat of a student of this question and a consistent advocate of the United States by independent action remonetizing silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 as contemplated under the Wheeler bill, S. 2487. In my humble opinion, the Pittman, Dill, Brownell, Leon, and Channing plans do not deal with the fundamentals of this question but are evidently formulated and suggested with the desire of temporarily increasing the bullion value of silver, one of the by-products of the mining interests, in this country rather than establishing the stabilization of exchange and securing a permanent financial yardstick applicable to our domestic as well as to the whole civilized world's international commerce.

Many months and possibly years of educational work would have to be expended to crystallize public opinion around the Pittman, Dill, Brownell, Leon, Channing, or other plans that are now before the country and further years of delay would be necessary before possible beneficial results could accrue to the mine owners in the permanent enhancement of the bullion value of silver principally a by-product and then no permanent stability of exchange would result as between silver standard and gold standard nations.

Neither agriculture nor any other class of our society would be permanently benefited and neither would the mine owners themselves be benefited except by a temporarily increased demand for their silver bullion, principally a by-product.

In the United States at the end of the calendar year 1929 we had silver stock in banks and treasuries of $855,498,000 estimated on our coinage value of $1.29 29/100 per ounce for fine silver.

If there were any change in ratio, then the total world's production of both gold and silver during the past 436 years would justify the adoption of a ratio of 14 to 1 but such an action, while making the bullion value of silver practically $1.47 per ounce for fine silver as compared with $20.67 per ounce for fine gold, would hardly justify the expense and annoyance incident to recoining our stock of silver dollars and subsidiary coin now in existence in the United States.

FUNDAMENTALS OF BIMETALLISM

The fact that the greater portion of the civilized world is on the silver standard and a very small portion of the civilized world now supposedly on the gold standard:

The fact that for many, many centuries silver and gold have been the only financial yardsticks of the civilized world:

The fact that the gold yardstick has been steadily increasing in its exchangeable value for all commodities and the silver yardstick has been decreasing in its exchangeable value for all commodities are the underlying reasons necessitating the earliest possible enactment of the Wheeler bill, in order to establish throughout the civilized world a common yardstick whether made of gold or silver in their exchangeability at a fixed price for each one with the result the world over of one financial yardstick, whether of gold or silver, to measure domestic commerce and international commerce and establish fixed international exchange.

Within one year after the enactment of the Wheeler bill, without any modification or amendment, into law Great Britain, France, Germany, and other European nations would be forced nolens volens to adopt the bimetallic standard or lose their world's trade with the silver-standard nations.

Thus no international conference or agreement, with their resultant delays, would be required.

It is estimated that our present National, State, municipal, county, corporate, and individual indebtedness in the United States is over $150,000,000,000, most of same being payable in gold. We are informed that we have in the United States less than $4,000,000,000 in gold.

Less than $4,000,000,000 of gold as the keystone of the arch on which an indebtedness of over $150,000,000,000 must rest inevitably, must ultimately result in financial disaster, unless this keystone be increased in relative size and stability which can only be accomplished by the earliest possible remonetization of silver on the basis of 16 to 1 by the United States without waiting for the consent, assent, or cooperation of any other nation on earth.

How can this best be accomplished?

Let Congress pass the Wheeler bill this session, and if vetoed by the President pass it over his veto.

Should this Congress fail to do this, then make the enactment of the Wheeler bill (S. 2487) a major issue in every congressional district in our country. Let every agricultural, labor, and commercial organization in the United States bring up this subject for intelligent discussion and issue a mandate by resolution to their Senators and Members of Congress instructing them to vote for this bill.

Request the nominees for the Presidency and Vice Presidency of both the Republican and Democratic Parties to declare their attitude on this question and pledge their honor if elected to sign the Wheeler bill if enacted by Congress and support in November the nominees giving such a pledge.

Should any of the public servants elected to the Presidency or Congress fail to obey the mandates of their constituents, then defeat them at the next opportunity for reelection.

Numerous plans have been suggested for increasing the volume of our currency.

Some advocate large bond issues with tax-exempt features and a rate of interest sufficiently attractive to insure their purchase.

Some advocate large governmental issues of currency bearing no interest; and in a study of this phase of the volume of money it is well to remember the experience of the German mark and the Russian ruble.

According to John Hix, a letter mailed from Berlin to London in 1923 bore postage costing 80,000,000,000 marks, once equal to $19,000,000,000.

Unlimited use of the governmental printing press must inevitably result ultimately in financial disaster to our country.

Unquestionably expansion in the volume of our currency would temporarily result in increased prices, but not necessarily values, for all commodities of which we produced no surplus for export, but would not correspondingly increase the world prices for commodities produced in other countries. No stability of international exchange would be assured. The cost of production would be increased in our own country, but the price of production in the rest of the world would in no manner be enhanced.

The enactment of the Wheeler bill only can bring about stability in international exchange, a resultant certainty of the establishment of prices and values for our agricultural products covering cost of production with a fair profit to the producer and minimize the ability of a few through control of banking or governmental operations to regulate the volume of currency or financial yardstick necessary for domestic and international commerce.

For many, many centuries the only primary moneys in the world have been silver and gold.

History shows for thousands of years that the money changers have tried to control the financial yardstick tokens of barter and exchange for both domestic and international commerce with the expectation that by so doing they could control world prices.

During the last century the Rothschild family dominated the finances of Europe, thus indirectly dominating the finances of the rest of the world.

Many think that with their ownership and control of the then known large gold mines in the world that in 1816 they forced Great Britain off the bimetallic and to the gold standard with the expectation of ultimately regulating and controlling the financial yardstick by making only one, namely, the gold yardstick, instead of two, namely, the silver and gold yardstick—the same influence forcing France to the gold standard in the 1850's, Germany in 1871, and the United States in 1873.

Theoretically it might be temporarily possible for 20 or 30 individuals, if they controlled the United States Federal Reserve Board, the Bank of England, the Bank of France, and the Bank of Germany, to enter into a conspiracy to regulate the volume of the world's currency, thereby resultantly controlling the prices of the world's commodities, so vitally affecting the happiness, contentment, occupation, and prosperity of the world's population.

If successful in effecting such a control, by expanding the world's currency they could inflate prices of all world's commodities and then distribute as fictitious values the securities which they had accumulated. After such accomplishment they could then decrease the volume of money, thus resultantly deflating or diminishing the prices of all world's commodities, with resultant greatly diminished prices in securities and then buy back at bargain sales the securities that they had distributed previously at inflated prices.

If such a conspiracy existed and continued unchecked this expansion of the volume of money with increased prices and distribution of securities held by the few followed by a period of decreased volume of money with resultant decreased prices of all the world's commodities with reaccumulation of securities at bargain prices would ultimately result in all the people outside of the few conspirators becoming practically vassals and peons, with the inevitable result that the people themselves would rise up in their wrath and take from the conspirators their wealth and probably their lives.

Is it possible that during the past century and a quarter these influences have tried to force gold monometallism upon the world and prevent the remonetization of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 with its resultant doubling of the world's primary money, because their efforts to control the volume of currency must be minimized under bimetallism for the reason that nature herself has limited the supply of both metals and their scarcity and the expense incident to their production into bullion thus absolutely preventing an overproduction of either metal or a regulation by man as to the volume of production as long as both are used for money at a fixed standard of valuation?

At the conclusion of his speech of last January 25, Senator WHEELER issues the following challenge:

"I assert—and challenge intelligent criticism, not mere denial—of the following statements:

"First. The enactment of my bill into law would immediately thereafter nearly double the volume of the world's primary money, with the resultant increased conservative credit basis of twenty times the amount of primary money thus added to the world's stock.

"Second. Within one year after the enactment of this bill the world's price of wheat, cotton, and all agricultural products would be more than trebled.

"Third. The purchasing power of over 50 per cent of the entire world's population now using silver as their sole yardstick of exchange and business transactions would contemporaneously be quadrupled; that is, the value of the silver stock would increase from 30 cents to $1.30, resulting in the creation of a market which would more than absorb all the surplus of our raw materials and manufactured products.

"Within two years all our present agricultural land values throughout the United States would be more than quadrupled, thereby transforming the present frozen assets of the country banks in agricultural communities into liquid assets.

"The unemployed-labor problem would be rapidly solved.

"Both labor and capital would be benefited.

"Contentment, happiness, and lucrative occupation would be substituted for discontentment and despair, with their inevitable resultant tragedies to follow.

"It would relieve starvation in the midst of plenty.

"This legislation would do more than all suggestions heretofore combined toward reviving, encouraging, vitalizing, and resuscitating business in this country and throughout the world.

"The market prices of securities, especially the common stocks of all corporations enjoying honest, efficient managements and being properly financed, where listed on some of the great stock exchanges of this country, would almost contemporaneously show increased activity and market value.

"Mr. President, when we realize and when most of us know that there is a shortage of gold and what there is is maldistributed; when we realize that there is the one basic fact that is causing this depression, why is it that we do not have the courage to meet the issue squarely? Are we afraid of these international bankers in New York, who have done more than any one else to bring about the present condition of this country? Is that the reason why we are afraid to tackle the real problem that confronts the Nation?

"When we know what is wrong with the country and what we can do to remedy it, are we going to sit idly by and do nothing merely because the remedy we could apply is opposed by a little handful of bankers who at the present time, through regulating the quantity of money, can regulate the price of commodities?"

Thus far I have seen no acceptance of the challenge or attempted refutation of his statement, and I am convinced that his predictions as to the benefits resultant from the enactment of his bill as affecting all classes of our society are most conservative and can not possibly be disproved or intelligently discredited by any person.

When Senator WHEELER introduced his bill S. 2487 in the Senate he requested it be referred to the Finance Committee. On January 11 same was referred to the Treasury Department with the request for a report from that department on said bill.

During my six years' service in the Senate followed by nearly two years more as chairman of two joint congressional committees I was cumulatively impressed with the improbability of a Member of Congress securing a favorable report from any of the departments of the administrative branch of our Government unless such bill increased the powers either in authority or appropriations of one or more of the governmental departments.

Believing that many of our present Members of Congress hold similar views based upon similar experiences, it seems appropriate to quote herein the department's reply of January 30, signed by A. W. Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury, in its letter to Hon. REED SMOOT, chairman of the Committee on Finance in the United States Senate.

"In response to your request of January 11, 1932, for a report from this department of bill S. 2487, 'To establish a bimetallic system, employing gold and silver, to fix the relative value of gold and silver, to provide for the free coinage of silver as well as gold, and for other purposes,' the following is submitted:

"Bill S. 2487 proposes that both gold and silver shall be legal tender in payment of debts in this country and shall constitute the country's monetary standard, at a relative valuation of 16 to 1; that is, that 16 ounces of pure silver shall be legally equivalent in value to one ounce of gold, and that both gold and silver shall be freely coined in the United States Mint at this ratio.

"In the markets of the world silver is quoted in terms of gold at a ratio of more than 60 ounces of silver to 1 ounce of gold. The passage of the bill in question would give the status of a standard monetary unit to a dollar consisting of silver in the amount of only sixteen times the weight of gold, which now constitutes the standard dollar; this would place a value upon silver which is nearly four times as great as its present value in the open market in relation to gold. If such legislation were to be enacted silver would be offered to the Government in large quantities for coinage at the proposed artificially high price for silver. Gold would immediately be withdrawn from our currency, and bank reserves for hoarding and for export, and silver soon would become the country's sole effective standard of value. It seems hardly necessary to present arguments against the substitution of a silver for our present gold standard.

Presumably this letter was signed perfunctorily by Mr. Mellon after directing some subordinate in the Treasury Department to prepare an adverse report to the Wheeler bill, S. 2487.

Let us analyze this letter.

Paragraph 1 simply repeats the caption to the Wheeler bill.

Paragraph 2 is a condensation of the context of the bill.

Paragraph 3 is supposedly the crux of Mr. Mellon's objection to the enactment of this bill. He says, "In the markets of the world silver is quoted, in terms of gold, at a ratio of more than 60 ounces of silver to 1 ounce of gold." How gratified Members of Congress must be for this information so readily obtainable from any newspaper containing stock reports. In the next sentence he says, "The passage of the bill in question would give the status of a standard monetary unit to a dollar consisting of silver in the amount of only sixteen times the weight of gold, which now constitutes the standard dollar; this would place a value upon silver which is nearly four times as great as its present value in the open market in relation to gold." This is exactly what the Wheeler bill, if enacted, proposes to accomplish. The concluding three sentences of Mr. Mellon's third paragraph and his objections as contained therein can not be justified by historical facts, logic, reason, or ordinary intelligence.

He says, "If such legislation were to be enacted, silver would be offered to the Government in large quantities for coinage at the proposed artificially high price for silver." From what source would these large quantities of silver come? Would the silver-standard nations, now representing over three-quarters of the population of the civilized world, voluntarily divest themselves of their only known financial yardstick (silver) in their domestic or foreign commerce, thereby necessitating cessation of all domestic business among themselves or foreign commerce with other nations of the world? Certainly not.

Mr. Mellon says, "Gold would immediately be withdrawn from our currency and bank reserves for hoarding and for export, and silver soon would become the country's sole effective standard of value." History absolutely refutes this mere personal opinion of Mr. Mellon, for during the period from 1792 to 1873 no such experience resulted in this country, although the United States during that period enjoyed the free coinage of both silver and gold, as provided for under the Wheeler bill, S. 2487.

Mr. Mellon concludes paragraph 3 as follows: "It seems hardly necessary to present arguments against the substitution of a silver for our present gold standard."

In the first place, the Wheeler bill does not contemplate nor provide for a silver standard, but for a bimetallic standard of both gold and silver at a fixed minimum value for each metal, namely, $20.67 per ounce of fine gold and $1.29 29/100 for an ounce of fine silver.

In the second place, Mr. Mellon neither has nor can he present intelligent arguments against the soundness of the Wheeler bill or the desirability of its earliest possible enactment into law.

Probably the real objection of the Treasury Department to this bill is a realization of the fact that nature's supply of both metals can not be regulated by man as well as centralized power in a few individuals may regulate the operations of the printing press as to the supply of the Nation's currency.

The volume of primary money which only controls values necessitates the cooperation of both nature and mankind. While the volume of other money does temporarily affect prices, it does not necessarily affect actual value, and can, as is now the case, be controlled by a few individuals through our present centralized power in our Federal Reserve Board.

If those Members of Congress possibly influenced by pride of authorship, personal jealousies, or advice of certain international bankers will now rally to the support of the Wheeler bill, S. 2487, it can readily be enacted this session of Congress and resultantly emancipate our people from the present era of selfishness, cowardice, and stupidity from which we are now suffering.

JONATHAN BOURNE, Jr.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 15, 1932.

TRIBUTE TO VICE PRESIDENT CURTIS

Mr. BLAINE obtained the floor.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin, before he enters upon a discussion of the pending bill, give me a second?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to acknowledge my indebtedness to the eminent Senator from Wisconsin, who is about to address the Senate on a very great measure.

I pause at this second to take advantage of this opportunity to express felicitations to the President of the Senate, serving as the Vice President of the United States, upon his being renamed as a nominee of one of the great political parties of the country, and to say that I feel I express the voice and the feeling of all the Senate that, whatever political view may be existing now or shall be expressed in the matters of a political campaign, the utter fairness, the desire for complete justice, the constant courtesy, and the considered civility which have always been extended to the Members of the Senate by the head parliamentary officer, the present Vice President of the United States, and now again the nominee, deserve grateful acknowledgment. This particular certificate I am sure the Senate delights to give in its felicitations to this officer upon the honor received at the hands of his great political party.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The present occupant of the chair thanks the Senator for his kind words.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7726) to provide for the immediate payment to veterans of the face value of their adjusted-service certificates.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, prefacing my remarks upon the bill now before the Senate, I desire to state that I am no new convert to the proposition of paying the soldiers' adjusted compensation in cash immediately. My position has been from the beginning that the obligation recognized by the Government of the United States through Congress ought to have been paid promptly. The fact that past Congresses have not seen fit to direct the payment of that obligation is no argument now why this Congress should not direct the payment of the obligation.

There is no one who denies the obligation. The Congress of the United States has determined that there is an obligation upon the Government of the United States, not only by a majority vote of both Houses of Congress but also by a vote of two-thirds of each House of the Congress when the original law was enacted in 1924.

Therefore, Mr. President, I need not discuss the validity of that obligation. The Government of the United States has confessed judgment. It is now estopped from denying that obligation. The only question now before the Congress is whether or not we will pay now or wait until 1945.

I desire to consider, calmly and dispassionately, the provisions of the bill which passed the House of Representatives, with respect to its effect upon the monetary system of the United States, upon the credit of the United States, and from the standpoint of the security of the United States.

The main plea that has been made to deny the payment of the adjusted compensation has been that it would threaten the financial standing and the credit of the United States. If such a plea had any basis whatever, it is now too late to set up such a plea. If that plea has any basis whatever, the Congress of the United States has been derelict in its obligation and duty toward the financial structure of our Government for the last 12 or 14 years.

If the Congress has made mistakes, if the Congress has made authorizations and appropriations which have threatened the financial integrity of the United States, that plea should not now be entered to deny the obligation into which the Government entered with the 4,000,000 men who served in the late war.

I desire to point out, as I said, calmly and dispassionately, the financial situation of the United States respecting its currency and its circulating medium. The daily statement of the United States Treasury, the last one I have been able to obtain, is dated June 13, 1932. That statement discloses the reserve that is back of our currency issue, and, as I will be able to demonstrate, this proposal to issue $2,400,000,000 of notes of the Government of the United States backed by an equal amount of bonds to guarantee the payment of those notes will in no way affect the credit or financial stability of the United States.

This is no new proposition. I find that there were outstanding on June 13 silver certificates, dollar bills, and $5 silver certificates, to the amount of $488,222,175. I find that there is deposited silver coin as a reserve against those silver certificates amounting to $501,073,417, which, on the date of this financial statement, were worth less than 28 cents on the dollar. In other words, there are in round numbers $350,000,000 of silver certificates without reserve. There is not even a guaranty back of them by way of bonds of the Government of the United States, such as is proposed in this bill. I repeat, there is $350,000,000 without a single ounce of intrinsic value in coin to sustain that enormous sum.

In addition to that, the United States Treasury statement discloses that there is $737,908,553 in national-bank notes outstanding on June 13, 1932, back of which is not a single ounce of gold and all of which rests exclusively upon Government bonds bearing a low rate of interest. There is nearly $740,000,000 in circulation of a currency of an identical character as is proposed by this bill. It is issued by the national banks. Under this bill the notes would be issued by the Government of the United States. That is the only difference. Both of them are guaranteed by the bonds of the United States.

In addition to these amounts the same statement of the Treasury Department discloses that there were $346,681,016 of United States notes and $1,222,550 of Treasury notes of the 1890 issue outstanding—almost $350,000,000 of the United States notes and Treasury notes, back of which there was a gold reserve of only $156,000,000 in round numbers, or another $200,000,000 of circulating medium that we have to-day. Nothing but the honor and integrity and financial power of the Government is back of that $200,000,000.

These three items aggregate in round numbers $1,300,000,000 of circulating medium, currency, and silver coin, without any security other than the promise of the Government of the United States either by law or under bonds which have been issued.

If the $2,400,000,000 proposed to be issued by this bill is dishonest money, then the $1,300,000,000 that are circulating to-day are dishonest. Yet despite the fact that there is $1,300,000,000 in circulation to-day of a currency without any reserve in gold or otherwise back of it, the financial stability of the Government and its credit have not been put in jeopardy.

But those are not the only sums, Mr. President. Those represent only a portion of the amount of currency that is in circulation or in anticipation of circulation against which there is not a single dollar or a single ounce of gold reserve. We have the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Congress has empowered that corporation to issue $1,500,000,000 in bonds guaranteed by the Government of the United States. Every dollar of bonds that may be issued under that act will be an obligation of the United States of identically the same character as would be the $2,400,000,000 proposed by this bill.

Mr. President, if there is, or if there has been, any danger that might affect the credit or the financial stability of the United States, why did those who now oppose this bill vote to obligate the Government of the United States for $1,500,000,000 of the same character of obligation as is proposed in this bill. Ah, Mr. President, when that bill was before the Congress the Congress was thinking in terms of property and not of human beings. When the Congress of the United States voted to obligate the United States for $1,500,000,000 for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, it was voting then to extend the credit of the Government for the benefit of whom? For the benefit of railroads, banks, and insurance companies. When the Congress was passing that bill we heard no voice here warning the Congress that we would endanger the financial integrity and credit of the United States. There was no voice here warning the Congress that we would debase our currency if we passed such a bill.

And yet, Mr. President, I challenge any Senator to point out the difference between the obligation of the United States under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act and the obligation of the United States under the bill now before the Senate. There is no difference. There is no distinction except in name. Ah, there is one difference! The funds of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation were designed for the railroads and the banks and the insurance companies and for the House of Morgan, while the obligation of the Government of the United States under this bill is designed for the relief of human misery. That is the difference. It is a vast distinction when we come to the human element.

The advocates of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act told us that we are loaning that money to the banks and to the railroads. Loaning it? Yes; technically we are loaning it for a period of five years. We have loaned millions of dollars to the railroads, a large portion of which has gone to J. Pierpont Morgan & Co. for the purpose of retiring obligations which Mr. Morgan's company held against the railroads. Other millions of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation have gone to banks.

Let us look at the railroads for just a moment. What assurance has the Government of the United States that that money will ever be repaid? Daily and weekly the carloadings are becoming less and less. More men upon the railroads are being thrown out of employment. As we see it to-day, there is no hope that the railroads can ever make a return sufficient to discharge their indebtedness.

Now let us see about the banks. The loans which have been made to the banks of the country are loans made upon security, it is true, but what security? The security came from the banks, obligations that they held against debtors of the banks. Those obligations owing the banks and which are now deposited with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation as security for the Government loans, came, or the money to furnish the original loans came, from the depositors in those banks. The securities that are required of course are ample to protect the Government of the United States—at least I assume they are ample; but what is going to happen to the banks when they are unable to pay the loans which they have obtained from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation? Surely the banks will not be able to pay those loans out of profits. That must be obvious to everyone. Then those loans can be paid only out of money of the depositors in the banks.

When the day comes for a settlement of those bank loans one need not be a prophet clearly to appreciate that those banks will find themselves in a condition far more serious than on the day they obtained the loan, with the result that the most valuable assets of the banks will be in the hands of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. That corporation will have a preference; the obligations owing that corporation by the banks must be first paid. So, Mr. President, out of the return of this money to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation will come another period of bank failures and bankruptcies.

What is going to happen when that time comes? Mr. President, you know and I know what will then happen. You know and I know that the Government of the United States, through this Government corporation, will not attempt to collect those loans. You know and I know, just as well as we know we are here this afternoon, that when the time comes to collect the debts against the railroad companies the Congress will not throw those railroads into bankruptcy and throw the banks into insolvency. That means either a cancellation of all those loans or a long period of moratorium. Of course, the funds supplied by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation are only loans, but is there anyone here in the Senate who believes that there is going to be an upturn in our affairs within the period when these loans must be paid? If there be such persons, then, Mr. President, I think they are clinging to a mere phantom—a phantom of hope—and our experience will be one of despair.

Mr. President, however that may be, the obligations of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of $1,500,000,000 are obligations of the Government of the United States, identically the same as will be the obligation of the United States under this bill. There is no difference in character so far as the financial standing and credit of the Government are concerned.

But that is not all. The House of Representatives passed what is known as the Goldsborough bill, which provides for the issuance of additional currency through the Federal reserve system. The Committee on Banking and Currency of the Senate in reporting that bill to the Senate incorporated in it an amendment by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] which provides for the issuance of at least $1,000,000,000 of national-bank notes without any credit other than the obligation of the United States, exactly the same security and the same obligation as is contained in this bill—bonds of the United States.

Now let us analyze some of these financial proposals just a little further. Under the Glass-Steagall bill, passed by the Congress in 1932, there is provision for an almost unlimited issue of circulating medium, 60 per cent of which is of identically the same character as is proposed in this bill. There is 40 per cent of gold, of course, as a reserve back of the circulating medium authorized under the Glass-Steagall bill, but 60 per cent of that medium, the greater part of it, has for its soundness and its stability only the soundness and stability that go with the Government of the United States—none other. That is identically the same standing and soundness, it is identically the same character of credit, identically the same character of obligation, identically the same protection as in the case of the issuance of the $2,400,000,000 under this bill.

Let me say here, Mr. President, that the bonds or obligations of the United States that are to be issued under this bill are to be deposited with the Federal reserve system and by that system sold as it may become necessary to sustain the market value of the obligations of the Government and prevent undue inflation. It is true that the same end could be accomplished by another means. The Government of the United States could issue $2,400,000,000 in bonds, sell those bonds, obtain the cash, and pay the soldiers' adjusted compensation. That is one way. It is proposed in this bill, however, that the other method shall be observed; but no matter which method may be employed the result is identically the same.

Mr. President, I have pointed out that there is $1,300,000,000 of the circulating medium, the security for which is none other than the obligations, the bonds of the United States or an obligation under the law, and of that $1,300,000,000 there is over half a billion dollars for which there is no obligation on the part of the Government except the obligation that obtains through its honor and its integrity as written into the law. There are no bonds issued as a reserve or a guaranty for the payment of the $550,000,000, as I pointed out earlier in my remarks.

Now, let me analyze this just a little further. Mr. Goldenweiser, director of research statistics of the Federal Reserve Board, testified before the committee in the House as follows:

> I have some figures here that will interest you. It shows that of the five and a half billion dollars of currency outstanding, there is about $750,000,000 in the banks, and about $1,250,000,000 probably still in hoards accumulated in the past 18 months and about $500,000,000 also in hoards but not created in this panic; just ordinary hoards, people having a little nest egg tucked away. There are about three hundred millions that are abroad, of which one hundred millions are in Cuba and two hundred millions in other countries, and about $100,000,000 has been destroyed. So that the total amount of money that does not do any actual business is $2,900,000,000 and the active money is about $2,500,000,000.

Of that active money, of that two and a half billion dollars, $1,300,000,000 has no security, no gold reserve back of it, no coin, nothing of intrinsic value, nothing other than the obligations of the United States in the form of bonds or by operation of law.

So, Mr. President, when we analyze the real condition of the circulating medium of the country we at once appreciate that we are here creating a circulating medium backed by an obligation, namely, Government bonds, that is of the same character as the obligation back of the outstanding $1,300,000,000 to which I have referred.

Moreover, Mr. President, under this bill it is provided that the Treasurer of the United States shall issue these bonds at a rate of interest of 3½ per cent, which rate will sustain the value of the bonds on a parity with existing Federal bonds.

Mr. President, after the issuing of the United States notes these bonds of an equal amount are to be deposited with the Federal reserve banks as the agents of the United States in approximate proportion to their current issue at the date of the passage of this bill, and then the Federal Reserve Board is directed to dispose of those bonds, or a portion of them, as from time to time it may be desirable or necessary. In other words, instead of disposing of the bonds and throwing $2,400,000,000 of Government securities upon the markets all at one time, it is proposed that these bonds may be sold from time to time, and thus preserve and stabilize a healthy market for United States bonds.

That means a monetary system far more stable than are the silver certificates, than are the United States notes that are now outstanding, commonly known as greenbacks, or at least as stable, with the exception of the $152,000,000 in gold reserves; as stable as are our national-bank notes; in fact, of a similar character and stability as is now the greater portion of our active circulating medium of exchange.

So much with respect to the method designed for raising the cash with which to pay the soldiers' adjusted-compensation certificates.

Now, I desire to turn my attention to the righteousness of the proposal.

As I said at the opening, the Government has settled the policy that there should be paid adjusted compensation. I do not contend that the Government afforded a compensation for soldiers that was on a parity with compensation paid to civilians during the war. I think that the Government, when it passed the soldiers' adjusted compensation act, drove a hard bargain against the soldiers of the country. The bill originated in the House of Representatives. It went to the floor of the House under a rule which prevented the submission of any amendments. The great financial organizations, the powerful vested interests of this country, who then controlled the Congress, saw to it that the Congress should take that bill or no bill; that the House should vote that bill without the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i." It was under those circumstances that the bill passed the House of Representatives; and, of course, that gave these powerful, sordid, selfish interests of the country the opportunity to drive a hard bargain against the men who served their country in the World War.

Mr. President, equality and justice often becomes comparative; and at the risk of repeating much that has been said by other Senators who have preceded me in this debate, I shall not forego the opportunity to point out, by way of comparison, the injustices and the inequalities in which the Government has been engaged respecting the treatment of the men who fought the war and the men who profited out of the war.

Mr. President, had the Government of the United States demanded payment of our foreign debts, had America demanded payment from foreign governments in an amount equal to the obligations the Government of the United States assumed respecting the World War, this adjusted compensation could have been paid fivefold out of the money owing to America by foreign nations.

The junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL], than whom there is none more familiar with the status of foreign debts and who has made a close analytical study of foreign debts, on May 27, 1932, summarized the debt settlements. I will quote but a portion of his remarks made in the Senate. He said, referring to the foreign governments:

> Their debts, exceeding $12,000,000,000—or, to be exact, $12,090,667,000—were canceled, the debtor nations agreeing merely to help us out in paying interest on the money we had borrowed to loan them. Yes; and all they are to pay, taken together, is the equivalent of less than 2⅝ per cent interest annually for 62 years on this $12,000,000,000. Then they are through. We must pay the $12,000,000,000 without help, and also the difference between this 2⅝ per cent interest and the interest we are paying on the money we borrowed to loan them.

The cancellation of over $12,000,000,000 owed by the foreign governments to the United States!

Is there any justice, is there any equality recognized in our Nation when we give away to foreign nations $12,000,000,000 and then deny this meager, measly amount of $2,400,000,000 to our soldiers?

And that is not all. Let us carry this comparison a little further. We will then have some conception of the manner in which we treat human beings here at home and the generous treatment we give to foreign nations and to special interests in our own country.

Before leaving this question of foreign debts, do not forget that our cancellation of those debts owed America was not only for the benefit of European countries, but also for the benefit of international bankers residing here in America. Those same foreign governments or their industries had borrowed billions of dollars, made private loans here in America, loans furnished by the international bankers; and if those international bankers could procure a cancellation of the amount owed to the American Government by foreign nations, then, of course, that would enhance their opportunity to receive payment from foreign governments on their private obligations.

As the able Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] said, we settled the war contracts. We paid in cash. We did not wait 15 or 20 years, or 27 years, in fact, as is proposed by the adjusted compensation law.

The settlement with the war contractors was made as the war came to a close, or within a short time after. So the great Government of the United States, our generous Congress, appropriated some $3,000,000,000 for the benefit of war profiteers, $3,000,000,000, a sum in excess of the amount proposed to be paid to the soldiers under this bill.

Mr. President, let me emphasize that when the Congress paid on those war contracts property was involved. Do not forget now that human life is involved.

Then the same generous Government, acting through a generous Congress, very shortly after the close of the World War, either by gifts or by loans, advanced to the railroads of this country $2,000,000,000, a sum almost equal to the amount proposed by this bill.

That is not all. Property not being satisfied, property demanding more payments, property, represented by the railroads of this country, is now knocking at the doors of Congress to have returned to them $360,000,000 under the recapture provision of the Esch-Cummins law, and, if I mistake not, if that bill can be brought before the Congress, those powerful interests will have no need of sending here an army of men to plead with the Congress to be generous with the railroads. There will be found lobbyists just outside the door, not in hundreds, not in thousands, but clever, scheming, dangerous men, a menacing influence to a free government will occupy only a seat or two in the waiting room of the Congress, and there command a supine and spineless Congress to bend its knees and lift its voice and vote millions for the benefit of the railroads.

Not long since there was a bill before the Senate proposing an appropriation of $125,000,000, of money that belonged to the people of the United States, to be turned over to the banks of this country. That is not a large amount, but the banks of this country, the large banks, the 1 per cent of the banks which control almost 99 per cent of the banking assets, are demanding that the Government pay into an organization for their benefit $125,000,000, and I understand with the recommendation and approval of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. President, I have briefly outlined some of the proposals in the past, some of the accomplishments in the past, some of the appropriations in the past, which have taken millions upon millions of dollars, the aggregate of which would have paid the soldiers' adjusted compensation many times. When those appropriations were put through there was no Committee on Finance warning the Senate or the Congress or the country that those proposals would threaten the financial structure of the Government and menace the credit of the Government. Oh, no; property interests were then involved. We were then worshiping at the golden shrine. But it is a different picture now.

When it is proposed to relieve human agony, human misery, human distress, ah, the specter is raised, and it is said that if we issue bonds we are going to menace the financial integrity of our country. But, Mr. President, I put this proposition as contained in this bill upon some other ground than relief. The Government owes an obligation, recognized and confirmed by law. When the Government recognized that obligation, it drove a hard bargain against the soldiers.

The time has now come, however, when there is agony, when there is distress, when there is hunger abroad in the land, when there is unemployment, and when, it was admitted by opponents of this bill in the House, 30 per cent of the former service men are without work. They have joined the great army of unemployed.

The question in this instance, Mr. President, as I said, is not a question of relief fundamentally. Of course if this bill is passed, out of this bill will come relief, but, as I maintained here this afternoon, now is the time when the American Government should discharge the obligation into which it entered in 1924. It should discharge that obligation, because now is the time when the veterans of the World War need and will receive the greatest benefit.

Mr. President, the performance of the obligation of the Government has been too long deferred. Recognition of that obligation was deferred six years too long. Then, in the discharge of the obligation, another 21 years was proposed. Twenty-seven years after these men laid down their arms we propose to pay the obligation if we vote against this bill.

Let me emphasize we forgave the foreign debts and forgave those debts promptly. We settled on the war contracts with the war profiteers promptly. We settled with the railroads promptly. Yet it is proposed by the opponents of the bill to defer payment of the obligation until 27 years after the obligation was incurred. The obligation was incurred even before the men were mustered out of service. The obligation was incurred the moment the men were inducted into the service of the United States.

Mr. President, I have endeavored to outline the situation primarily from the standpoint of the fiscal affairs of our Government. I do not know whether there is any Member of the Senate who is willing to rise in this Chamber and justify a vote to kill the bill. But if there be such a Senator, then I challenge him to point out in what respect and to what degree I have been in error in outlining the fiscal condition of the Government in relation to its currency, its monetary system, and its bonded obligation. I do not want to engage in any passionate plea. That would not serve the purpose that I want to accomplish as I look upon the situation.

I have chosen rather to give the matter a cool, calculating analysis so that those who may oppose the bill will not be able to raise the cry that we are menacing and threatening the stability of our financial and credit system in this country. Mere declarations, mere vaporings, that the provisions of the bill threaten our financial structure are not an answer. I have marshaled the facts respecting our fiscal condition. I challenge now anyone to controvert successfully those facts.

However, Mr. President, in closing I desire to emphasize what the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] said and what was said by the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] in relation to war. I shall make this emphatic observation, that war will not cease until those who make profit out of war are compelled to pay the cost of war, even in agony and sacrifice, as has been done by those who fought the war.

I make the further observation, Mr. President, that we can not do our full duty until by law, by the orderly processes of the Constitution, we compel those who profit out of war to surrender those profits that are made out of the blood and the sacrifice and the lives of the young men who are sent to war.

Mr. President, let me say that the money these men will receive if this bill is passed will not be hoarded. There may be among the soldiers, and no doubt there are, men who are in such financial circumstances that they do not need the immediate payment of the adjusted compensation. But we can not subject these service men to the humiliation of declaring themselves as paupers before they receive the money. They have all performed services of relative character in the same war, and we must accept the entire group as a whole. We are not here to settle that question now. That policy has been fixed by the Congress. The Congress has said that all men who served in the World War for more than 60 days shall be entitled to the compensation fixed by the original act. Congress has fixed the policy and Congress has settled the obligation as to its terms, and we are here only to carry out that obligation by making the payment immediately instead of deferring it until 1945.

Mr. President, I can not close until I shall have read a brief excerpt from a statement by General Glassford, who is Superintendent of Police for the District of Columbia, in which he referred to the veterans who have come to Washington to present in person their pleas in behalf of themselves and their comrades. General Glassford said:

> They have demonstrated their loyalty to the flag. They were heroes cheered in 1919. To-day they are without employment, without means of support, homeless, and outcasts. They can not find work. Surely they are entitled to an opportunity to acquire a decent livelihood.

Thus spoke the head of the Metropolitan police department of the Capital City of the Nation. These men are here lawfully, as I suggested on the floor not many days ago when I was attempting to obtain from Congress an appropriation that the Government might furnish proper housing facilities, proper sanitation, proper hospitalization, and necessary food for these men. I said they were not coming to Washington in a mass demonstration for the purpose of coercing Congress; that they were here as citizens of this great Government of ours, gentlemanly, courteous in their attitude and conduct, pursuing a lawful course, for it must be conceded, as Congress has declared, that what a person may lawfully do singly men may lawfully do in concert. So these men are here in their own right and in behalf of themselves and their comrades everywhere.

Great sacrifices they have made; they have been subjected to great privations; billeted in the mud and the damp, with inadequate housing, inadequate food, inadequate sanitation, inadequate hospitalization; in fact, many of the necessities have been denied to them which the Government could have granted to them had the Secretary of War recognized our obligation to humanity. With plenty of tents, available from the stores of the Army of the United States, and field kitchens, blankets, and all the necessary equipment that attends an army, yet this Government declined, through the Secretary of War, to furnish some of the bare necessities that these men might live here in some degree of comfort. However, notwithstanding all these neglects, notwithstanding that Congress has deferred their just compensation, notwithstanding that the Government has settled with the war profiteers, has settled with the railroads, has settled with every selfish interest, notwithstanding all the neglects and all the injustices, these men have conducted themselves peacefully, quietly, gentlemanly, and courageously. When they go home they are entitled to carry to their respective communities the message that they not only honored themselves but they honored World War veterans everywhere.

Mr. President, I have, in a very inadequate way, outlined the evidences of the ingratitude of this Government toward the veterans; I have endeavored to outline but briefly its generosity toward foreign governments and foreign peoples and its refusal to perform properly its obligations to our soldiers.

I recall when these boys went to war how the bands played and the colors were unfurled as they were marched to depots to be entrained. I recall how eloquent gentlemen mounted the platforms, bade the boys good-by, and told them what a grand and glorious opportunity was afforded them to make this sacrifice for their country, even the sacrifice of their lives. As I said the other day, however, some of those eloquent gentlemen had their fingers crossed when they told the boys that when they came back jobs would be procured for them, that compensation would be procured for them, that everything would be done for them, that nothing would be neglected.

Oh, yes, Mr. President. These boys, men to-day, are the Tommy Atkinses of Kipling fame. When they come to Washington to make their plea and to present their petition asking the Government of the United States to discharge its obligations in these times of stress and poverty and unemployment, the Government, if the Senate rejects this bill, will say to these Tommy Atkinses:

> Its Tommy this, and Tommy that,
> But, Tommy, stay outside.

It was quite different in the days of the war; then it was:

> "Mr. Atkins" when the troopship's on the tide.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

INVESTIGATION OF CAMPAIGN EXPENDITURES

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I rise to address myself very, very briefly to a matter quite removed from the issue which is pending before the Senate at this time. Perhaps I owe the Senate an apology for taking even as little time as I shall.

I am not one who expects that in public life one can avoid criticism. I expect a great deal of it, and for the most part quite ignore it. However, there are occasions when criticism becomes so vicious that one can not avoid giving it attention.

A newspaper, published not in my own State but in a neighboring State—the Minneapolis Journal, of Minneapolis, Minn.—has been giving vent to many editorials of late respecting the expenditures made by the campaign-fund investigating committee, of which I was chairman two years ago. I should quite ignore these editorials were it not for the very, very vicious nature of them, and the reflection which has been cast upon one Member of the Senate besides myself, a colleague of mine on that committee. The only possible way that I have of reaching those who may read these editorials is by the method I now pursue.

The particular editorial to which I refer is one alleging and insinuating that my colleague upon the committee, Senator DALE, of Vermont, and myself may have had an understanding relative to the division of spoils or payments which were made to Senator DALE by reason of an expense incurred by him in a trip from his home to a meeting of the committee in Montana and back again. The RECORD is resorted to in this editorial to show that Senator DALE was paid twice for the same trip, in each case the amount being in excess of $400. So, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point the details of the voucher appearing on page 3439 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 29, 1931, and a second voucher appearing on the same date at page 3441, and a third voucher appearing at page 3454 of the same issue of the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be made.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. NYE. Also I ask to have printed in the RECORD a telegram which I have this day addressed to the Minneapolis Journal and to the Grand Forks (N. Dak.) Herald, which saw fit to copy the Minneapolis paper's editorial.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The telegram is as follows:

JUNE 17, 1932.

EDITOR GRAND FORKS HERALD,
Grand Forks, N. Dak.:

The following telegram was just dispatched to the Minneapolis Journal. Since it concerns your paper also I desire to make it available to you, with a request like that I have made of the Journal, for a correction and revealing of the facts. The telegram follows: "In a recent editorial published in the Minneapolis Journal and copied under date of June 13 in the Grand Forks (N. Dak.) Herald you have presented alleged abuses by myself of the funds made available by the Senate for investigation by the Select Committee on Senatorial Campaign Expenditures, of which I was chairman. You recite voucher No. 63, showing payment to the 'Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. for transportation and Pullman charges for Senator NYE and assistants from Washington D. C., to Chicago; to Salisbury, N. C.; to Louisville, Ky.; to Elizabeth, N. J.; to Glacier Park, Mont., for period from August 9 to September 3,' said voucher calling for payment of $512.15. You then recite voucher No. 95, as follows: 'Transportation for self, members of committee, and investigators, including Pullman charges, meals en route, and porterage, August 22 to 24, Fargo to Glacier Park, Mont., $112.84.' Your ostensible purpose in presenting these two excerpts from vouchers has been to at least insinuate that I had been reimbursed twice for the same item. If your Washington correspondent would have taken the time to inquire into these vouchers and availed himself of substantiating information, which would have been made available to him upon inquiry, he would have found that voucher No. 63 was made to cover the expenses of three different agents of the committee in the prosecution of committee work, and the only part which was for the expense of myself was for a ticket from Washington to Chicago.

"In the same editorial you again refer to voucher No. 63, in which is shown a payment to Senator DALE, of Vermont, to cover expenses of attending meeting, payment being in the amount of $420. Then you refer to voucher No. 330, made out to Senator PORTER H. DALE, of Vermont, under date of January 6, 1931, carrying this item for reimbursement of expenses, 'Transportation, including Pullman charges, Washington, D. C., to Glacier Park, Mont., and return to Island Pond, Vt., $409.24.' You then declare that this seems 'on its face to be a double payment of Senator DALE'S fare to Glacier Park, with no way of telling who got the extra $400.' Your insinuation is that if Senator DALE himself did not receive this double payment that some one else, possibly myself, received it through a system of juggling accounts. I should hardly expect any fair play from a newspaper that serves the interests of selfishness and greed as thoroughly as does the Minneapolis Journal, but for the sake of the record and in fairness to Senator DALE and myself, I respectfully request that you present to your readers the truth revealed by the vouchers which you quote in part. In the same voucher No. 330 from which you quote you will find in the item concerning Senator DALE'S account the following language, which clearly reveals that the amount of $420 was deducted 'less voucher paid on September 19, $420.' This should clearly reveal to the most dense mind that Senator DALE was not paid more than once for the specific journey with which your editorial deals. In reviewing the statement of expenditures by the committee, as contained in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, from which you have quoted in your editorial, I am at a loss to see how your editorial of recent date to which I have referred could have been the result of any error or oversight. Instead it appears very clearly to have been an editorial by one undertaking a task with most malicious intent. May I request your immediate attention to the affording of a correction of the impression which your editorial has left with respect to Senator DALE and myself by publication of the facts in as prominent a position as the false charges appeared in your columns?"

GERALD P. NYE.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7726) to provide for the immediate payment to veterans of the face value of their adjusted-service certificates.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate, and open to amendment. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the question is, Shall the bill be read a third time?

The bill was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill having been read three times, the question is on its passage.

Mr. ASHURST. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the yeas and nays may be considered as ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield before that is done?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I asked General Hines to transmit to me a statement of the pertinent data in regard to the proposed amendment of the World War adjusted-compensation act. I have just received those data, and now ask that they be inserted in the RECORD at this point. I shall not take the time to have them read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The act of May 19, 1924, provided for veterans with a lesser rank than major in the Army and lieutenant commander in the Navy being credited with additional compensation on the basis of $1 per day for service in the United States and $1.25 per day for service overseas in excess of 60 days, with the limitation that the adjusted-service credit of a veteran who performed no overseas service could not exceed $500, and that the credit of a veteran with overseas service could not exceed $625.

Credits of less than $50 were made payable immediately in cash and credits due deceased veterans who had not made application for an adjusted-service certificate were payable to their dependents in 10 equal quarterly installments.

Veterans making application for the benefits conferred by the statute who established entitlement to a credit in excess of $50, had added to the adjusted-service credit because of deferred payment an additional 25 per cent, and this gross credit was applied as a net single premium on the basis of the American experience table of mortality with interest at the rate of 4 per cent, compounded annually, to fix the amount of the adjusted-service certificate provided for in the act, which is essentially in nature a 20-year endowment insurance policy.

The adjusted-service certificate fund was created for the purpose of providing for the payment of the certificates upon maturity. The amount to be contributed by the United States Government was provided to be calculated, based on an annual level premium according to the American experience table of mortality, with interest at 4 per cent, compounded annually.

It was also provided that after the expiration of two years from the date of issue the adjusted-service certificates would have a loan value to be computed on the basis of 90 per cent of the reserve value based on an annual level net premium over 20 years, calculated in accordance with the American experience table of mortality, with interest at 4 per cent, compounded annually. The act provided that the certificates would be, after the 2-year period elapsed, good as collateral security for a loan from any bank or trust company incorporated under the laws of any State, Territory, or possession of the United States. The law was subsequently amended on the 3d day of March, 1927, whereby the United States Government life-insurance fund was made available for use for the purpose of making loans on adjusted-service certificates, and under date of February 27, 1931, further amendment was passed increasing the loan value of the certificates to 50 per cent of the maturity value and making the adjusted-service-certificate fund available from which loans could be made.

As an illustration, a veteran with 178 days' service in the United States in excess of 60 days and 176 days' service overseas, would be entitled under the act of May 19, 1924, to a service credit of $398, which would entitle the veteran to an adjusted-service certificate of $1,000 in the average case. On the basis of the certificate being issued January 1, 1925, it would have, if the earned portion of the 25 per cent additional credit is allowed, a present value of $542. If the whole of the 25 per cent is credited, the present value would amount to $623. If the veteran borrowed the full 50 per cent on March 1, 1931, on June 30 there would be a lien against the certificate of $530.34.

The maturity value of the certificates outstanding as of May 1, 1932, amounts to $3,514,713,333. The amount of the adjusted-service credit used in fixing the maturity value of the certificates is $1,407,551,398, and the additional credit granted because of deferred payment amounts to $351,887,851. The present value of the certificates on the basis of allowing the earned portion of the additional credit is $1,879,331,854; and the present value, if credit is given for the full 25 per cent without regard to its being earned by the passage of time, is $2,160,151,557.

The number of certificates pledged with the Veterans' Administration for loans is 2,567,367, and it is estimated that 150,000 certificates are held as collateral security by banks. The loans outstanding aggregate $1,415,220,091.79, distributed as follows:

Adjusted-service-certificate fund	$991,166,776.78
United States Government life-insurance fund	364,053,315.01
In the hands of banks	60,000,000.00

There has been appropriated to date to the adjusted-service-certificate fund from the Treasury by the Congress $1,096,000,000. The present value of the fund is $1,110,886,457.78.

H. R. 7726 provides for the immediate payment of the maturity value of the certificates, which would require funds to the extent of $2,403,326,875.22 being provided.

The amendment suggested by Senator THOMAS of Oklahoma would limit the payments to be made under H. R. 7726 to those veterans who are in need. However, as need is to be presumed as established for those veterans who have already borrowed on their certificates and as a prima facie case is to be concluded on the basis of a statement from the veterans who have not borrowed, it is not considered that the amendment advocated is sufficiently restrictive as to materially decrease the amount of funds required to give the bill effect.

The plan recommended by Senator CONNALLY, of Texas, is to fix a present value on the adjusted-service certificates by using the adjusted-service credit plus the additional 25 per cent, and thereon granting interest at the rate of 4 per cent, compounded annually, the value of the insurance already enjoyed by holders of unmatured certificates to be disregarded.

The total adjusted-service credit amounts to $1,407,551,398 and the amount of the 25 per cent additional credit totals $351,887,851, or an aggregate of $1,759,439,249. The amount of compound interest would be $591,051,594, and the present value of outstanding certificates based upon this method of calculation would be $2,350,490,843, and as the value of the adjusted-service-certificate fund is $1,110,886,458, the additional amount which it would be necessary to raise is $1,239,604,385.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oklahoma that the yeas and nays be ordered? The Chair hears none, and the yeas and nays are ordered.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, inasmuch as I have occupied considerable time upon the floor upon this bill, if there is any Senator who desires to be heard, either for or in opposition to it, I shall gladly waive my right to the floor at this time in his favor.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I expect to consume a little time, but I am perfectly willing that the Senator from Oklahoma should go ahead, and I will speak later.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I will not use any extended time in the further advocacy of this bill.

The bill has been pending before the Congress since its convening in December. The bill has been thoroughly considered in the other branch of the Congress. Hearings were held before the appropriate committee for some three or four weeks.

After the hearings were concluded the Ways and Means Committee, having jurisdiction of the bill, made an adverse report upon the bill.

The parliamentary situation was such that the proponents of the measure could not bring the bill to a vote. The friends of the measure were forced to resort to the filing of a resolution in the Rules Committee of the House of Representatives asking for a rule under which this unfavorable report could be considered before the House. The Rules Committee refused to report that resolution favorably; whereupon, under the rules of the House, a petition bearing the signatures of 145 Members of the House was at the proper time presented to the House, and under the rule the resolution had to be brought forth from the Rules Committee. The rule was finally adopted, bringing the measure before the House for a vote.

After consideration in the House a vote was taken and the bill received 211 votes for, and 176 votes against; whereupon the bill, under the parliamentary practice, was messaged to this body.

The bill came here but two days ago; and I wish to express my personal appreciation of the activities of the Finance Committee in receiving this bill, giving it a speedy consideration, and reporting it back within 24 hours, although with an adverse recommendation.

So, Mr. President, the bill now is before the Senate with an adverse report—a report that the bill do not pass—and I am violating no confidences when I say that the vote against the bill in the Committee on Finance was 12 against and 2 for.

Mr. President, I am not under any delusion as to the fate of this measure before this body. I know the influence at work against this measure. It is very largely propaganda, but it is propaganda to serve a special interest, and that interest is those who have their wealth in fixed investments, who want the buying power of the dollar kept at its present elevated value.

The Department of Labor has advised that the dollar at the present time will buy $2.03 worth of farm commodities; that taking the wholesale list, the present value of the dollar will buy $1.53 worth of commodities. Hence, those who have wealth in the form of fixed investments, those who have bonds, those who have mortgages, those who have notes, and those who have vast bank deposits, want this value kept at that high figure, so that their dollars will buy more than 100 cents of values.

Mr. President, this bill is before this Senate and the Congress upon a petition signed by more than two and one-half million American citizens. The petition is on file in the archives of the Congress. Because of the delay in the other House, because these petitioners failed to get speedy action upon this bill, these petitioners, many of them, something like two months ago, started toward Washington. They have been coming ever since; and to-day more than 20,000 veterans, American citizens, and signers of this petition, are here. The galleries of the Senate are now packed with these citizens. The Capitol is now surrounded by these veterans, and just across the way yonder to the east at this moment are thousands of those citizens, looking this way, anxious to know the fate to be decreed to them in the next few hours.

Mr. President, I have this day seen telegrams from every point of the compass, giving reports of delegations now on the way here; and from the information I have, many thousands more veterans and citizens are now on the road to Washington.

Mr. President, this fight has just begun. It will not be settled here to-day. It makes no difference what vote is cast here; the smaller the vote the more citizens may come. If this bill is defeated here today, these citizens will not immediately leave Washington, for they have no place to go.

Mr. President, at this point let me place in the RECORD some figures. These figures are of date January 1 of this year. At that time the Director of Veterans' Affairs had issued certificates to 3,658,527 veterans. Those certificates totaled the sum of $3,636,075,538. The number of veterans who had made applications for loans and who had received loans on the first of this year were 2,454,741. The amount loaned to those veterans was $1,233,859,223. The amount still due on the first of January—that is, the amount between the amount loaned and the amount of the certificates—was $2,402,216,315.

In order to pay the balance due on those certificates, in round numbers, it will take the approximate sum of $2,400,000,000; and that is what this bill calls for, the raising in some manner of $2,400,000,000 and placing that money in the hands of the Director of Veterans' Affairs, with the order and the direction to proceed to distribute such sum among the 3,658,527 veterans who hold these certificates, and in proportion to the amount due each veteran.

Mr. President, I shall take no time in trying to convince the Senate that the veterans want this money. That is admitted. I shall take no time in trying to convince the Senate that the veterans need the money. That is likewise admitted.

What reason can be assigned for delaying the payment of the amount due? Those who object to this proposal say that the amount is not now due and will not be due until 1945. Who decreed that the amount would not be due until 1945? The Congress of the United States issued that decree. The veterans had nothing to say about it. For months and for years they had made their claim to the Congress, asking for the amount they claimed to be due, and they did that only when they saw that the railroads had made claims for adjustments and had seen the Congress make the adjustments promptly. They did it only when they saw that the contractors had made claims for adjustments and had seen the Congress make the adjustments promptly. They did it only when they saw everyone else having claims come to the Congress asking for adjustments and securing their adjustments promptly. Then it was that the veterans came to the Congress and likewise asked for an adjustment.

The Congress, after years of consideration, finally agreed that in order to be magnanimous it would give the veterans the sum of a dollar a day for the time they spent in American camps and a dollar and a quarter a day for the time they spent across the seas. On such a basis the adjustment was computed and such sum, with seven years' interest omitted and a small amount added, was placed in the form of a certificate due in 1945. The certificate is nonnegotiable and is nontransferable, and these men, receiving the certificates, must live somehow until 1945, when they may get the amount the Congress has decreed should come to them.

Mr. President, it is contended by some that this is a bonus to the soldiers of the Nation. For the sake of the argument, let us admit that it is. But is this the only bonus Congress has granted? During the war we loaned Italy a very large sum of money, running into billions of dollars, and when we adjusted with that nation we gave Italy a bonus to the extent of 75 per cent of the money loaned, such 75 per cent amounting to billions and being the money of the American people. Thus the Congress has given Italy a bonus in the form of a reduction of the amount that nation owed the United States of America.

During the war we loaned France about $4,000,000,000, and after the war in the adjustment with France we reduced the amount approximately 50 per cent; so Congress has heretofore granted a bonus to France in the sum of approximately $2,000,000,000.

During the war we loaned Great Britain vast sums of money, and after the war we adjusted with that great Empire on the basis of 75 cents on the dollar.

Mr. SMOOT. Eighty-three per cent.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I am corrected by the Senator from Utah. He says it was 83 per cent. We still gave Great Britain a rebate of 17 per cent on about $4,000,000,000; and Congress in ratifying that adjustment has already, years ago, before I reached Congress, given the nations making up the British Empire a bonus in the sum of 17 per cent, and such bonus runs into multiplied millions.

Then when Congress convened last December, foreign nations knowing how generous the United States is with her bonuses came to Congress and asked for further financial favors. The bonus they then asked was in the form of a postponement of the interest due on the debts owing us; and the Congress, maintaining its reputation for generosity, recalling the precedents established in the making of bonuses, granted a further bonus to the foreign nations in the total sum of $250,000,000.

Bonuses? Yes, Mr. President, the precedent is set. Everyone has had a bonus save the men who most deserved a bonus, and those men, held off for 14 years, now with a judgment against the United States, are here seeking to collect such judgment against this, the strongest, the richest, and the most powerful nation on the earth.

When the vote comes, now very soon, if my poll is correct, there will be a two-thirds vote, and probably more, registered against the payment of a judgment against this Government, a judgment which the Congress has already confessed and now refuses to pay.

Mr. President, it has been said by some that this is a dole, and that the Congress is now being asked by the veterans of the Nation for a dole. Let me, for the sake of the argument, admit that it is a dole. Already in this session Congress has granted doles to the big business concerns of the Nation. Only a few days ago the distinguished majority leader in the other branch of the Congress gave out an interview in which he said that the bills passed by the Congress were nothing more nor less than doles to railroads, doles to banks, doles to trust companies, and doles to life-insurance companies of the Nation. Of course, he referred to the loans being granted by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

A bonus? A dole? I care not what you call this adjustment with the veterans—whatever it is, we made it legal, we placed the stamp of our approval upon it, and the only question now is, When will the Congress pay this just, honorable, and patriotic debt?

Mr. President, it takes no time to convince the Congress that these veterans need this money. The House of Representatives, the other branch of the Congress, has admitted that they need it, because they passed the bill and sent it to us. But this day the same branch of the Congress which passed the bonus bill has sent to this body for our consideration House Joint Resolution 418. What does that joint resolution provide? It provides in section 1 for the making available to the Red Cross of 40,000,000 bushels of wheat now owned by the Government in order to enable that organization to keep on feeding the hungry people of this Nation.

The second thing this resolution does is to propose to make available 500,000 bales of cotton to clothe the naked citizens of the country.

Mr. President, the other branch of the Congress has already done its part in providing relief for the people of the country.

The other branch of the Congress passed the Goldsborough bill and the measure is before the Senate. The purpose of that bill was to direct the Federal Reserve Board to make money more plentiful, and thereby make it cheaper. The bill came to the Senate, and what happened in this body? It has been emasculated and has little if any chance of passage.

The other branch of the Congress passed the Garner bill, providing money for the employment of men on public works, and that bill came here, and since it arrived I have not heard it mentioned, except in private, in the smoking rooms, and in the corridors. The leaders of the Senate are against the Garner bill, they are against the Goldsborough bill, and they are against the bonus bill. Mr. President, what chance does a poor bill have when the leaders on both sides of the aisle are against it?

The issue presented by the bonus bill is simply this: When will the Senate of the United States pay this sacred and patriotic debt? That is the question. We will be asked to vote upon that question shortly. Those who vote "yea" will say we will pay it now. Those who vote "nay" will say we will pay it sometime, perhaps in 1945. That is the issue presented to the Senate. Already the Senate is on record in making adjustments and in voting bonuses and doles. My fellow Senators, are you proud of the record that has been made? That record stands in just a few words:

Billions for big business, but not a sou for soldiers!

The unemployed have had little consideration at this end of the Capitol. The farmers of the Nation, our largest single group, embracing 30,000,000 of American citizens, had about two days' consideration. After almost no consideration, with most of the seats in the Senate vacant, all at once the so-called friends of the farmers came in from the cloakroom and sent the bill back to the committee, and there it sleeps serenely. The veterans have been asking for this legislation for months. They are here demanding that we pass the bill. When the vote comes now very shortly the chances are it will not pass unless some miracle happens—and miracles do not happen in the Senate of the United States. They happen some place else perchance, but miracles are an unknown thing in this body. What happens here happens by design.

Mr. President, if the unemployed are to have no consideration at the hands of the Senate, if the farmers are to have no consideration here, if the veterans are to have no consideration here, and if we turn them down to-day, such defeat is nothing more nor less than a sentence of those veterans to go forth to beg or starve or steal. There is nothing else left for them to do. There are no jobs. There is no work. They can beg. They are forced to do that now.

Yet, Mr. President, we live in a land of plenty. We have so much wheat that wheat is selling for only 26 cents a bushel in my State. We have so much food of every kind and character that the harvesting of the products can not be paid for by the total amount the farmers receive at the market place. We have so many hogs and so much livestock for meat that hogs are selling for less than 3 cents a pound to the farmers of the Nation. With food, with wheat, with corn, with cotton, with everything the Nation needs, the face of America is literally alive with wiggling men trying to fill their empty stomachs and to find a place to lay their weary heads.

Mr. President, the Senate mistakes the temper and the intelligence of these veterans. Why, Mr. President, in the jungles where the bananas and the coconuts are plentiful do the monkeys starve? As long as there are bananas and coconuts in the jungle even the lowly monkey has his food. Are not the citizens of America as intelligent as the monkeys of Africa? If they can get no work, if they can not collect their honest debts, if they can not collect their judgments, what are we telling these soldiers to do? We send them hence to choose their course. There is but one course open to them. These men will not starve.

Mr. President, I want to explain briefly the bill that is now pending before the Senate. The bill provides for the immediate payment of the balance due to the holders of adjusted-service certificates. There are more than 3,000,000 of them. The bill provides a plan for raising the money with which to make the payments. The plan is such that it will not take a single dollar from the taxpayers of America. The plan is such that it will not take a single dollar from the Public Treasury of the Government. What is the plan?

The plan is that the Government through its proper authorities will be directed to issue bonds to the extent of the amount necessary to make the payments, more than $2,000,000,000, and to deliver the bonds to the Federal reserve banks of the Nation. That is No. 1.

No. 2. The proper officials are directed by the bill to have printed Treasury notes in the total sum necessary to make the payments, approximately $2,400,000,000, and to deposit the Treasury notes in the same Federal reserve banks.

These are the two processes that place the money in the Federal reserve banks of the Nation. We have the money already. The Treasury has bales and bales of money printed yonder at the western end of Pennsylvania Avenue. This money has already been printed. It has been baled and it is now in the drying room, aging prior to going into circulation. It is claimed that new money is not good in its wearing qualities. It has to be printed and placed in a special drying room and seasoned and aged so it will wear well. Down at the Treasury we have billions of this money now printed, awaiting an opportunity to be placed in circulation. If the money is placed in the Federal reserve banks, it will be subject to the order of the Director of Veterans' Affairs to make these payments.

Someone says that is a strange kind of money. Just print money and put it out in the Federal reserve banks and then pay it out? Why, Mr. President, that is not a strange kind of money. We to-day have in circulation two identical kinds of money—Treasury notes of 1890 and the United States notes issued in the sixties. Away back yonder in the sixties, when we had trouble between the North and the South, the northern side ran out of gold, ran out of silver, ran out of specie. They could not borrow any money any place. Nobody would loan money to the Government, so the Congress in the sixties enacted a law providing for the issuance of hundreds of thousands of dollars of United States notes. In that early day they did not go to the expense of printing bonds to secure the notes placed in circulation. The Government, your Government, my Government, printed United States notes and began to pay them out to soldiers, paying them out in making settlement for the things the Government must have to wage that conflict.

Those notes, known as greenbacks, not supported by bonds have served the purpose so well that they are still in circulation to-day. There are $350,000,000 of those notes still out among the people of America to-day. There are no bonds back of those notes. They are simply the promise of this Nation to pay and they are so satisfactory even without bonds back of them that they circulate to-day as money, they circulate to-day on a parity with Federal reserve notes, with gold certificates, with silver money, and with gold money. There is no better money in America to-day than those United States notes. They are so good that the Treasury Department does not want to cancel them. That is the same kind of money that we propose to use in making the payments to these veterans.

In 1890, only 40 years ago, we issued some Treasury notes. They were not backed by bonds. They were simply the promise of the Nation to pay. Paper money issued in 1890, known as Treasury notes, has been found so successful and so satisfactory that we still have those notes in circulation.

Thus we have two precedents for the identical kind of money proposed to be issued and used to pay these veterans—the Treasury notes of 1890 and the greenbacks issued under act of Congress in the sixties. But the notes proposed to be issued under the pending bill are to be backed by bonds of the United States of America. Are those bonds good as security for this money? Is there any Senator who will say that such money is fiat money? Is there any Senator who will assert that the bonds of the United States are not good security for the issuance of a circulating medium to the extent of $2,400,000,000?

Mr. President, we have much of our money based only upon bonds. Every dollar in circulation of national-bank currency is based upon nothing but 2 per cent consols and a 5 per cent redemption fund. The 5 per cent redemption fund is not necessarily gold. The 5 per cent redemption fund can be silver, it can be gold, it can be gold certificates, it can be silver certificates, it can be greenbacks, it can be Treasury notes, it can be Federal reserve notes, it can be Federal reserve bank notes, or it can be national-bank currency.

If you happen to have in your pocket a national-bank note, let me tell you that the only thing back of that note is a 2 per cent consol; and that means a 2 per cent bond that some bank has purchased and sent to the Treasury and deposited, and had issued against it the note you have in your pocket. The only security back of that note are these 2 per cent bonds plus a 5 per cent redemption fund in any sort or kind of lawful money.

Mr. President, what is behind the Federal reserve note that you have in your pocket, if you are so lucky as to have a Federal reserve note in your pocket? There is nothing back of that Federal reserve note except 40 cents worth of gold and 60 cents worth of commodities—60 cents worth of wheat, perchance; 60 cents worth of cotton, perchance; 60 cents worth of hogs, perchance; 60 cents worth of merchandise, perchance; that is all that is behind your Federal reserve note—40 cents in gold and 60 cents in commercial paper. Yet we are told that these new Treasury notes, backed by the promise to pay of 120,000,000 people, based upon the property of a Nation that two years ago was worth $500,000,000,000, would be worthless.

There is a simple plan provided for the payment of this bonus, namely, the issuing of bonds and placing them in Federal reserve banks, printing the paper, the United States notes, and placing them in the same banks, and then when the Federal reserve banks deliver some of these new notes to Director General Hines the banks will have in their vaults the bonds of this Republic to secure those banks, for they will know that at some future time the United States will collect taxes and redeem the bonds and thus cancel the outstanding currency. That is the simple plan, Mr. President, provided in this bill for the payment of this bonus. It does not take a single dollar from the Treasury of the United States; it will place in circulation two and a half billion dollars of new money; but, Mr. President, to that form of financing strong opposition exists.

It is contended in some quarters that the Federal Reserve System is now placing money in circulation. Is there any Senator upon this floor who believes that to be so? Is there a single Senator upon the floor to-day who believes that there is more money in circulation now than there was 30 days ago or 60 days ago or six months ago? I will place in the RECORD at this point the facts—and they are facts that can not be disputed. I read from Form No. 1028, Treasury Department, of date December 31, 1931, which was the last day of last year, which would mean the first day of this calendar year so far as this record is concerned.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Treasury Department, as the Senator knows, has stated that the trouble with the country is not the shortage of currency, but the contraction of credit. I should like to have the Senator's view upon that allegation, which is made by the Treasury Department in opposition to the bill.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I am delighted to have that question asked and will endeavor to answer it. Mr. President, there is just as much difference——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. May I add that the Treasury Department says that the passage of this bill would increase the contraction?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Yes, Mr. President; and yesterday the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury told the committee that there was more money in circulation now than there was a short time ago, but when confronted with the facts he had to admit that he either did not know or presumed what he had stated to be so. There is as much ignorance in the Treasury Department about money, if it be possible, as there is here in the United States Senate. [Laughter in the galleries.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let there be no demonstration in the galleries.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, there is just as much difference between the amount of money in circulation and the amount of money on deposit in the banks of the Nation as between day and night. Six months ago all the banks in this Republic had on deposit $50,000,000,000 in money, so they claimed; yet there has not been a night in 10 years when these same banks have had in their vaults the sum of $1,000,000,000 in gold, silver, and paper, the kind of money with which one can go across the street and buy his lunch at this hour of the day. Many people think that when the banks have $50,000,000,000 on deposit it means that the banks have $50,000,000,000 of gold, silver, and paper in their vaults. I yield for anyone to challenge my statement.

Mr. President, the banks did have on deposit $50,000,000,000 of deposit money, or credit money. Let me tell my good friend from Massachusetts the kind of money they had on deposit. In former times when business was good and people could borrow money, a farmer would go to a bank and say, "Mr. Banker, I want $1,000," and the banker would say, "Yes, Mr. Jones; I am glad to accommodate you; sign this note." And the farmer would sign the note, and immediately the banker gave Mr. Jones credit on his pass book for a deposit of $1,000 in the bank. Had the farmer paid a single penny into the bank? Not a single penny, and yet when night came and the tabulation was made the deposits of that bank had jumped up $1,000. That is the kind of money that makes up the $50,000,000,000 of deposits, of credit money in the banks of the Nation. The banks were full of that kind of money once, but during the last few months they have lost more than ten billions of it, and now the banks are so impoverished that the Comptroller of the Currency is afraid to ask the banks to make a statement of their present condition. Yet we are told upon this floor that the banks are full of money and we do not need more money. Credit money, deposit money is the kind of money that is in the banks. It is credit money; it is deposit money; it was created by the constituents of the Senator from Massachusetts and of mine in the State of Oklahoma.

The banks still have those notes; the farmers still owe their notes; the bankers can not collect because the farmers can not pay. Why can not the farmers pay? They have not the money. Why do they not get the money? How can the farmers get money except in two ways? The first is to borrow money, and they can borrow no money now; and the second is to sell their products, but they can sell no more, because no one has money with which to buy; and yet we are told that the country is being drenched with money.

Mr. President, the value of the notes in the note-cases of the banks of America is problematical. When prosperity returns values will return to the products of the farm, and mine, and factory. Then the notes may be paid and banks may return to normalcy.

It did not take me long to discover, Mr. President, when I came to the Senate that financial legislation does not originate in this body; it is not passed upon in this body. When the financial interests of New York City want a bill passed they have the experts in their banks get together and prepare the bill and they send it down to Washington. The most recent experience is that it goes to the White House, the White House issues invitations to a breakfast; at the breakfast the bill is unfolded, on the same day the bill is rushed to the Capitol, introduced in the House and Senate, and then we are kept here in the night time to pass the measure. So, if the metropolitan bankers are against any financial bill, the same chain works. They are against this bill, and the vote about to be taken will disclose the extent of the influence of the denizens of the caves of Wall Street.

Mr. President, is there any further question the Senator from Massachusetts desires to ask? If so, I shall be glad to answer it, if I can.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator has, in part, answered my question; but I should like to have the Senator amplify, if he will, or explain, if he will, the assertion made by the Treasury that this measure, if enacted into law, will further contract credits in the United States; that the trouble with the United States to-day is the contraction of credit, and that there will be no revival of business until there is a loosening up of credit.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I should like the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts to have the same conception in his mind that I have in mine. I may not make myself clear, but the $50,000,000,000 on deposit in the banks of America are based upon the notes of the people of America. Those notes are secured by farm commodities, by the stocks and merchandise of factories; by industrial plants. To-day factories are not prosperous, they are making no money; the railroads are not prosperous, they are making no money; farmers are not prosperous, they are not making money. So the security backing this $50,000,000,000 of deposits has vanished; it has gone; and until the bankers can see some way whereby value can be brought back into the securities they hold they will make no further loans.

Mr. President, I can not blame the bankers. I have made the statement frequently upon this floor that I can not blame the bankers of America for not making loans. The money in their banks is not their money; it belongs to their depositors. The capital stock is theirs, the surplus is theirs, their private deposits are theirs; but the mass of their deposits belongs to the farmers and tradesmen and business men who patronize those banks. The bankers are merely the trustees for those deposits; and so long as the farmers have no producing power, the farmer's security will be of no value; and so long as the industrial institutions are not prosperous and making money, they will likewise have no value.

The security now back of these deposits has withered, and until this security can be brought back the money that they have on deposit is of questionable stability. I can not blame them for not putting out more money.

The Treasury Department says: "We must have a return of prosperity, a return of confidence." Well, Mr. President, how are we going to get confidence among the people with 30,000,000 farmers—the largest single group of our people—to-day selling their cotton at 4½ cents a pound, wheat at 26 cents a bushel, hogs at 2.85 cents a pound? They can not pay their taxes. They can not even pay the interest on the notes that they have outstanding. If something could be done in line with the desires or the dream of the Treasury, fine! But what plan has the Treasury for bringing back an element of value upon which confidence may again be restored?

Banks can not loan money; they never will loan money until the commodities of the country regain some value and until the people of the country have something they can give as security, and the only way that can be done is to place additional money in circulation.

We tried to put money in circulation through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. That was not money. It was just credit. They issued loans to the extent of $700,000,000, and there has not been a single dollar placed in circulation—just bookkeeping credit.

What plan has the administration? What plan have the leaders on the majority side of the aisle? And what plan have we over here on my side for placing money in circulation?

The Garner bill might do it, but that is pigeonholed. The Goldsborough bill would have done it, but that has been killed; and all that is left now is the bonus bill.

I am for the bonus bill to help the soldiers, and yet I am for the bonus bill to help the other people of America; and it will help the other millions of our people more than it will help these poor boys in the Senate galleries.

I used an illustration on yesterday. I will do it again to-day.

Suppose, for example, in the State of my good friend from Arizona, in one of those fine irrigated valleys, a farmer there has an irrigated tract, just for illustration I will say of 100 acres. He would be rich indeed if he had an irrigated tract of 100 acres in Arizona or anywhere else. I use those figures only for illustration.

A farmer in Arizona has a farm of 100 acres, a productive farm; and, in order to make my illustration complete, I am going to use crops that are not produced in Arizona, but they are produced on the farm. This good land in Arizona, belonging to a good, old, honest American farmer, last year produced an abundant supply of wheat. He could not sell his wheat. He put the wheat in his granary, a thousand bushels of it. This irrigated land produced cotton in Arizona, and last year he raised 25 bales of cotton. He could not sell the cotton. He had it ginned, he had it compressed, and placed in his warehouse; and there is that good old farmer to-day, with the land as good as it ever was, with a thousand bushels of wheat in his granary and 25 bales of cotton in his warehouse.

He had a son when the war broke out—a patriotic son who volunteered and went to war and served honorably and came back; and a few years ago the Congress voted him a certificate of $1,000. Times got hard out in Arizona. The veteran son of this good old honest farmer had to have some money. He borrowed $500 on his certificate. That money has been used. There is still due him $500; that is all.

Now, here is the picture: The farmer has his land. He has a thousand bushels of wheat, 25 bales of cotton, and he has a son with a $500 certificate. If we pass this bill, immediately the son gets this $500. What does the farmer get?

Perhaps you could not answer that question. Economists tell us, New York bankers tell us, that if this bill passes, it will bring down the buying power of the dollar so low that it will raise commodity prices out of all reason. If this should happen, and I hope commodity prices do go up, then wheat will increase in price and likewise cotton will increase in price.

If this bill will do what economists claim it will do, it will make money cheaper; and as money comes down, commodity prices will go up.

Let us see if it will have that effect. They claim it will. New York bankers claim it will. The enemies of this bill claim it will. The distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] says that we must not debase our money. If money does not come down, commodity prices will go up. What will happen to the farmer in Arizona?

In place of being able to get 26 cents a bushel for his wheat to-day, he might get $2 a bushel for that wheat. He can get only 26 cents to-day. If he could get $2 for it, he would make a profit of $1.75 on 1,000 bushels of wheat, which would make him $1,750 profit on his wheat alone.

To-day he can sell his cotton for only 5 cents a pound. That is $25 a bale. Twenty-five bales of cotton at $25 per bale means $625—the worth of his cotton crop to-day. If cotton goes up to 10 cents a pound, he would get double. He would get double under the terms of this bill if it does what economists claim it will do. His cotton to-day is worth $625. If cotton should be raised to 10 cents a pound the Arizona farmer would get $1,250 for his cotton. If it went to 20 cents a pound he would get $2,500 for his cotton. He would make $1,750 on his wheat, and at 20 cents per pound for his cotton he would get $2,500, so that the increase brought about by this bill would mean a profit of $1,875 on his cotton, and remember he is not the veteran. He is only the father of the veteran. His son gets $500, the amount we owe him; but by paying the veterans, if this bill does what its enemies claim it will do, it will raise commodity prices and give the farmers of America an increase in prices for their wheat and their corn and their cattle and their hogs.

If they could get those prices, Mr. President, in a few days they could pay their taxes. In a few days they could pay their interest. In a few days perhaps some of them could pay their debts. They could buy some new clothes. They could buy some shoes. If those things should happen, the stores of the country would begin to have some business. If the stores had some business, they would make demands upon the wholesale houses for more supplies. That would make business for the wholesalers; and when the wholesalers were low in supplies they would begin to make demands upon the factories, and the factories would have to go out and get men and buy raw material and buy coal and buy oil and buy gas with which to operate their factories.

Mr. President, I have said many times upon this floor that I am for this bill because it will help the soldier. But where it helps the soldier 10 per cent, it will help the population of America 90 per cent.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. Along the lines that the Senator is speaking at the present time, I want to suggest to him that I myself had a conversation with one of the leading industrialists of this country, a man who is looked upon by the conservatives of this country as one of the greatest financiers of the country. He made the statement to me that there was not anything so very bad about this bill; that it would do exactly what the Senator says it would do; that it would inflate our currency, and that it was necessary for the purpose of bringing up commodity prices. He stated that the only bad feature about the bill was that other groups might come down and demand exactly the same thing that we are doing for this particular group.

I want to say to the Senator that I am going to vote for the bill, and I am going to vote for it because of the fact that the one thing that is necessary to be done in this country to bring about prosperity is to bring up the commodity price levels of the farm commodities and other things that have to be sold upon the world market.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I appreciate the statement just made by the distinguished Senator from Montana.

Gentlemen of the Senate, the issue before this body at this hour is between two groups, one group who think we have too much money in circulation and another group who think we have too little money in circulation. When you vote, place yourselves upon the respective sides of that question. You who think we have too much money in circulation vote against this bill. You who think we have too little money in circulation I ask you to vote for this measure.

Mr. President, a vote for this bill will, in my judgment, discharge an honorable, an admitted, a patriotic debt that this country owes to three and a half million of its brave defenders. If this bill should pass, it will place more money in circulation. On the 1st of last January, as I started to tell you a moment ago, there was in circulation the sum of $5,641,000,000. On yesterday at 4 o'clock there was in circulation $5,467,000,000. In other words, on yesterday at 4 o'clock there was $174,000,000 less in circulation than there was on the first day of this calendar year, and yet through the public press the people have been advised that the Federal Reserve Board was placing money in circulation through the open-market operations of buying Government bonds.

Mr. President, during the past three months the Federal Reserve Board has bought $900,000,000 worth of Government bonds, and paid for those bonds with Federal reserve money; yet, in spite of that record, in spite of putting $900,000,000 in circulation, to-day we have $174,000,000 less of money in existence, outside of the Treasury, than we had when we started the open-market operations.

What has happened? The Federal reserve banks have bought these bonds. They have bought them from the banks; and the banks, of course, have sold them to the Federal reserve system. The moment the banks selling the bonds receive the money, they send it back to the Federal reserve system to pay their loans; and to-day the policy of the Federal reserve system, through its open-market operations, has enabled the banks of the country to pay their obligations to the Federal reserve system. Less money is in circulation to-day than six months ago; and the old economic rule comes back to work. When wheat is scarce, wheat is high. When cotton is scarce, cotton is high. When wheat is plentiful, wheat is low. When cotton is plentiful, cotton is low. Now we have wheat plentiful, and selling for 26 cents to the farmer. Now we have cotton plentiful, selling for 4½ cents a pound to the farmer. The economic rule works with money just the same as with commodities. When money is plentiful, money is cheap; when money is scarce, money is high, and since the first of the year, the Federal Reserve Board, the agency of this Congress, has contracted the currency $174,000,000. Yet wise Senators are wondering why each week commodity prices and wholesale prices keep on going down and down and down.

Mr. President, if this bill should pass, it would place more money in circulation, it would reduce the value of money. The dollar would not buy as much, and that is the reason why influential forces, those who control this Nation, are against the bill. It would cheapen the dollar. I hope it will, and that is one reason I am for the bill. It will cheapen the dollar. Yet I am not in favor of the dollar going as low as the mark did in Germany. It will not go that low.

During the war we had six and a half billion dollars in circulation. Now we have only five and a half billion in circulation. When the war was over we had a billion dollars more money in circulation than we have at this good hour, and that billion dollars of money in circulation more than we have now was responsible for wheat selling for $2.50 a bushel and cotton for 40 cents a pound, and other things in proportion. But the folks who govern this Republic did not want cotton to sell for 40 cents a pound; they did not want wheat to sell for $2.50 a bushel. Then they invoked the economic rule by making money scarce, and during the first 15 months after the famous McCormick resolution passed this body in May, 1920, the Federal reserve system withdrew and canceled approximately $100,000,000 a month until some $1,500,000,000 was destroyed, and when money became scarce, money became dear; and the higher went the dollar, the lower went the price of cotton, the price of corn, the price of wheat, and the price of livestock, and the price of the goods and commodities produced in the State of my good friend from California.

The policy which is now in vogue, if not stopped, will force these prices lower. Wheat could sell for 10 cents a bushel and cotton could sell for 2 cents a pound. The vote on this bill will be a vote in favor of making money scarce or in favor of making money plentiful. If you want to make money scarce, vote against the bill. Thus the Senate will say to the Federal Reserve Board, "Your policy of making money scarcer is hereby approved."

Mr. President, if this bill should pass, in addition to paying the debt due the millions of our veterans, in addition to making money more plentiful, in addition to reducing the value of the dollar, it will reduce taxes. I make the positive declaration that if this bill passes it will reduce the taxes of the people of the Nation.

To-day it takes a flock of trucks for a farmer to haul enough wheat to the county seat to pay his taxes. Pass this bill and raise the price of wheat, and one truck filled with wheat could be taken to the county seat and the wheat sold for enough money to pay the taxes on an average farm of the country.

I make the positive statement that if this bill passes it will reduce taxes and the interest of the country. If it reduces taxes it will reduce interest and will reduce debts.

If this bill passes, and if it will have the effect I claim it will have, it will raise commodity prices. It will raise the price of sugar; and instead of a sugar grower in Utah, the State of the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee, having to have a train to haul enough sugar to market to pay the taxes on his farm, he can take a medium-sized truck, perchance, and haul enough sugar to the market to liquidate his taxes.

This bill will pay the debt due the soldier, it will reduce the taxes of the Nation, it will reduce the interest of the Nation, and it will reduce the debt of the Nation.

Mr. President, we have been fighting in this body for months over salary reductions. If this bill should pass, if the dollar should be brought down in buying power, that would have the effect of cutting the salaries of every employee of the United States. Perchance I should not stress that point. I will let my statement stand in the RECORD, however. It is a fact that if this bill should pass it will not cut the number of dollars the employees receive, they will still get their $10,000 per annum, or their $5,000 per annum, or whatever the salary is, but the dollars will not buy as much. It will have the force and effect of decreasing the salary of every man and woman in the Republic.

Mr. President, we passed a bill a few days ago raising rates of taxation upon the taxpayers of the United States. I made the statement then, and I make it again, that the mere raising of tax rates will not necessarily raise revenues. At the present time the income-tax payers have no incomes, and hence under the law they are not obligated to pay any income taxes. We could have raised the rates under the income brackets of that bill a thousand per cent, and if the people have no incomes, it would not raise a single dollar.

Mr. President, in that bill we raised the rates upon corporations, but under the law unless corporations make net profits, they pay no taxes, and to-day not only are corporations making no net profits, but many of them have no gross profits, because they are closed and not operating. Raising rates of taxation upon corporations will not necessarily raise additional revenues.

Where are we to get the revenue to run this Republic? We find ourselves with a $4,000,000,000 Government with less than a $2,000,000,000 income. This bill proposes to put some money in circulation and get it out among the people. If that is done, there will at least be that $2,400,000,000 which the people might spend. Eventually some of that would get into some of the taxable brackets and get into the United States Treasury in the form of taxes. But if something is not done, I wonder where the people of the United States are to get the money to pay the expenses to run this, the most expensive Nation on the globe? I am for this bill because it will assist the people in securing funds with which to pay their taxes.

Mr. President, if this bill should pass, it would do the identical things I claim it will do, because economists say it will, because those who oppose it say it will. When I introduced a bill on this identical question I placed in the RECORD a statement, and some opponent of the measure with more time, perhaps, than ability saw the bill, and he proposed to write a book about the bill and challenging the statements I had made. I placed some of his statements in the RECORD.

This writer admitted that the bill would do the things I said it would do, would cheapen money, and because it would cheapen money, because it would place more money in circulation, because it would help the farmer and the producer, because it would hurt the men who have fixed investments, he said the bill should not pass.

To-day when the roll is called, if you want to help those who have their wealth in fixed investments, kill this bill. On the other hand, if you want to help the veterans, the farmers, the owners of factories, the miners, and if you want to help the 120,000,000 people of America, I implore you to vote for the bill.

Mr. President, a moment ago I made a statement to the effect that bills were recently passed by the Congress, and especially by the Senate, in the nature of relief, in the nature of doles, and for the benefit of the big business concerns of this country. That statement can not be challenged.

Just a few days ago the Pennsylvania Railroad received a loan of $17,500,000 from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Other railroads have received appreciable amounts. It is the purpose of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make loans, to grant relief, to grant bonuses, to grant doles to the biggest concerns in the Nation.

Mr. President, there is a Latin phrase which, if I remember it correctly, runs something like this, "Pro bono publico." The interpretation of this phrase may become an issue in this campaign. What do those words mean? We are going to say in a few moments what they mean. If you kill this bill, you interpret that Latin phrase to mean, "Bonus for big Republicans." If you pass this bill, you interpret it, "Bonus for the people of America."

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. "Bonus for big Democrats," too, you might just as well say.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I do not challenge that statement.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Why does the Senator say "big Republicans"?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Because it is so nearly universally true, let me say. I am not the sponsor for the class just now alluded to by my distinguished friend from California. I regret that that class has such power and such influence over those on my side who wear the garb of Democracy.

Mr. President, I shall vote for this bill, but before I take my seat I desire to place in the RECORD a short statement found in the RECORD already, but I desire to have it placed in the RECORD at this point in connection with my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BENEFITS CLAIMED THROUGH BILL

The enactment of the proposed measure will, I claim, bring about the following results:

First. It will adjust a long drawn-out controversy with the ex-service men by paying them in full the amount of an obligation now by law admitted and acknowledged.

Second. It will increase the actual cash in practical circulation to an amount almost double that in circulation to-day.

Third. It will distribute such additional circulation uniformly to all parts of the country.

Fourth. It will reinvest directly and immediately more than three and one-half million men and their families with buying power.

Fifth. It will help directly a class of our citizenship not yet reached by any relief measures passed or proposed.

Sixth. In addition to helping the veterans it will help the farmer by providing funds in the hands of million with which to purchase the farmers' produce.

Seventh. In the same way the farmers will be benefited, the small stores, the large stores, wholesalers, factories, truck lines, railways, and banks will be benefited.

Eighth. To the identical extent that small business is benefited the big business concerns will profit in added business and consequent dividends.

Ninth. The bill, if enacted, will serve notice to the people that money, instead of getting scarcer and thereby dearer, will become more plentiful, and to such extent as it becomes more plentiful it will become cheaper.

Tenth. Such notice that money is to become more plentiful and thereby cheaper will have the immediate effect of thawing out the money frozen in hidden places, as well as the money in the safety deposit boxes and the credit and money in the bank vaults of the country.

Eleventh. Such notice will serve to cause merchants to place orders to replenish their empty shelves and such orders will react on wholesalers, factories, the producers of raw materials, and on each and every class of wage earners.

Twelfth. As money comes down in buying power, commodity prices of all kinds will rise, and this is the identical end that all, save the favored few, are now demanding should be accomplished.

The bill, if enacted into law and if it will do what I have outlined, will bring about the following concrete definite results:

(a) Will advance prices of commodities.
(b) Will decrease the value of all debts.
(c) Will decrease the value of all interest.
(d) Will decrease the value of all taxes.
(e) Will decrease the value of all salaries.
(f) Will help the debtor class.
(g) Will prevent further bankruptcies and bank failures.
(h) Will put money in circulation and make it possible for the people to pay their taxes in support of local, State, and the Federal Government.
(i) In addition to the foregoing it will, I claim, help immediately and directly the great masses of our people in that it will raise prices, stimulate business, add value to property, add value to the collateral now pledged for loans, and thereby enable borrowers to repay the loans, and will bring a definite and speedy end to the worst depression in history.

Such results, I claim, will come from the enactment of this measure.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, following that statement, I desire to place in the RECORD a statement showing the amount of benefit which the several States will receive if this bill passes.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, in order that those who may be interested in this may have the amounts presently in mind, I will read, in round figures, what the States would receive:

Alabama $29,000,000.
Arizona $7,000,000.
Arkansas $25,000,000.
California $136,000,000.

I wonder if the good people of the sunny State of California could use $136,000,000 at this particular time.

Colorado, $21,000,000.
Connecticut $29,000,000.
Delaware $3,000,000.
District of Columbia $18,000,000.
Florida $24,000,000.
Georgia $35,000,000.
Idaho $8,000,000.
Illinois $157,000,000.

I wonder if that would fall like a pall upon that financially embarrassed and dejected city bordering upon Lake Michigan.

Indiana, my native State, gets $59,000,000. I have more than a thousand relatives in that State. I know their condition. This money would be most welcome to the community wherein my relatives live.

Iowa $46,000,000.
Kansas $34,000,000.
Kentucky $38,000,000.
Louisiana $31,000,000.
Maine $13,000,000.
Maryland $31,000,000.
Massachusetts $82,000,000.

Mr. President, this sounds like calling the roll in a Republican National Convention. [Laughter.]

Michigan $85,000,000.
Minnesota $53,000,000.
Mississippi $21,000,000.
Missouri $67,000,000.
Montana $11,000,000.
Nebraska $24,000,000.
Nevada $1,000,000.
New Hampshire $8,000,000.
New Jersey $77,000,000.
New Mexico $66,000,000.
New York, $245,000,000.

I wonder if that would help the banks on that short and crooked street starting at the river and ending at the cemetery?

Mr. President, if something like this bill does not pass, those gigantic financial and banking structures in Wall Street may not long be used for their present purposes. If some change does not take place, they, like the farms, mines, and factories, will close and become the abode of bats and owls. Only a few years ago in Russia they had some of the finest bank buildings in the world. They were not as tall, but were elegantly constructed of the finest marble, bronze, and glass. I saw them only recently. From those fine bank buildings of Moscow and Leningrad the bronze was gone, the glass was broken, and the rooms were empty. Where once were banks with connections throughout the world we now see Russian peasants peddling their potatoes, their cabbage, and their wares. I would not suggest that this might happen to Wall Street. But Wall Street lives upon this Republic. Wall Street does not exist upon that little narrow, crooked street. Wall Street does not live upon the city of New York. Wall Street does not live upon the State of New York. Wall Street gets its prosperity, when it enjoys prosperity, from the wide stretches of plains and prairies reaching from the North to South and from East to West. When the people are prosperous Wall Street is prosperous. When the Nation is impoverished Wall Street is impoverished, and when calamity comes Wall Street does not escape.

North Carolina $38,000,000.
North Dakota $9,000,000.
Ohio $117,000,000.

Oklahoma—I am proud that we will get $39,000,000. That is not a meager sum. We have 100,000 veterans in my State. Three hundred of them are here, many in the galleries, now. They need the money. They want the money. Their buddies back home need the money. Their buddies back home want the money.

Mr. President, Oregon gets $22,000,000.

Pennsylvania gets $172,000,000; and the great City of Brotherly Love, which casts its shadow almost over the capital, has not enough money to pay its teachers, its policemen, its firemen, and its public officials. I wonder if Pennsylvania is opposed to having brought to that State this vast sum of money of which Philadelphia would gets its proportional share?

Rhode Island $13,000,000.
South Carolina $21,000,000.
South Dakota $13,000,000.
Tennessee $36,000,000.

Texas—the State of Texas, as large as all New England, a State hundreds of miles north and south and likewise hundreds of miles east and west, an empire that could be divided to make many States the size of some we already have in this Republic—gets $95,000,000.

Utah would only get the measly sum of $8,000,000. I do not blame the good Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the chairman of the Finance Committee, for being opposed to the bill when, under the terms of the bill, New York is to get the sum of $245,000,000, Illinois $157,000,000, Pennsylvania $172,000,000, and poor little Utah will get only the measly sum of $8,000,000. I do not blame the distinguished Senator for opposing the legislation. But I do blame other Senators whose States will receive multiplied millions under the terms of the bill and whose constituencies in their States will be called upon to pay only a few meager millions.

To the South and the West this is a business proposition. New York made it so. Pennsylvania has made it so. Illinois perchance has made it so. They claim they will pay more in taxes to pay the bonus than they will get from it. But they must pay it after while anyway. They want to postpone the evil day as far as they can toward 1945. But these poor States out in the South and the West, whose sons need this money, who want to collect this judgment, are getting more for their States than they are paying in taxes. I wonder how the Senators from those States are going to explain to their folks back home their poor business judgment? Some Senators make bold to say that they oppose this bill because the burden falls unjustly upon their States.

Vermont will receive $5,000,000.

Virginia, the mother of Presidents, gets $41,000,000 of this money.

Washington $37,000,000.
West Virginia $25,000,000.
Wisconsin $52,000,000.
Wyoming $7,000,000.

Mr. President, I shall vote for this bill. At the same time I will keep a close tabulation of the votes and before the result is announced, if my forecast is correct that the bill is to be defeated, I will change my vote from yea to nay. I shall do it for but one purpose, and that is in order that I may enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill fails of passage. Immediately after the vote is announced I will enter a motion to reconsider the bill, in the hope that we may yet secure enough votes to pass the bill.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state the inquiry.

Mr. LEWIS. May an amendment to the bill be submitted now to be laid on the table and abide its proper time for a vote?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That may be done only by unanimous consent, the bill having been read three times and the pending question being, Shall the bill pass? The yeas and nays have been ordered on that question.

Mr. LEWIS. I gather that by unanimous consent only may an amendment be tendered to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If unanimous consent is granted to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was ordered to be read a third time, then the bill would go back to the second reading and the Senator could offer his amendment.

Mr. LEWIS. I would not trouble the Senate so far.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, in my public service of 30 years in Congress I have never failed to vote in favor of any bill coming before Congress that in any way favored or helped the ex-soldiers of any of our wars. I hope that my vote to-day may not be construed as a deviation from that course.

No man living, Mr. President, has a greater hatred for war than have I, and yet I believe I tell the truth when I say that no living man is in favor of going farther for the benefit of an ex-soldier than am I. I have listened to the eloquent addresses that have been made to-day in favor of the bill. With a very great majority of what has been said in its favor I most heartily concur. I heard the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON], himself being a veteran of the World War, in his eloquent address condemn war in terms that are never surpassed and seldom equaled. I believe if we could listen to the voices of every one of the 17,000 veterans who are encamped around the Capital, the condemnation of war given by the Senator from Indiana would receive unanimous approval.

Mr. President, I am one of the oldest men in this Chamber. I realize that not many years in the usual span of life are yet spared to me. I realize, too, that in my long public service I have made many mistakes, that I have often been compelled to vote upon important measures when I was insufficiently informed to cast an intelligent vote. I realize, too, that my judgment has undoubtedly been wrong many times. Condemnation has been visited upon me by party men, and during the war by men whose patriotism was at least 200 per cent, that I had been unworthy of the place of honor which my people have seen fit to give me. I realize when I follow the dictates of my conscience and go contrary, as I have many times, to the alleged leaders of my party many honest party men condemn me in the severest terms.

Mr. President, I have in my hand the roll call of the Senate taken on our declaration of war against Germany. I find there the names, six in number, of Senators whom the older Members of the Senate will remember well. I am one of the six who cast a negative vote upon that occasion. The other five have gone to their reward, and, as I said a while ago, it can not be many years until I must follow those five comrades who voted with me on that occasion. There were never six men condemned in more severe terms than were we. I do not want to be understood, Mr. President, as casting any reflection upon the other Members of the Senate who voted the other way on that occasion. I believe they were moved, as I claim I was moved, by the conscientious conviction that in their vote they were performing a patriotic duty. But it was a day of wild excitement; there had been a powerful propaganda spread abroad. Millions of money had been spent to drive us into that great carnage. Thousands of newspapers had been influenced; all sorts of reports and stories were circulated, afterwards even at Government expense, to deceive the people of the country, as the people of every other country were deceived, as to what the contest really meant and who was to blame for it all.

In my own mind, at least, I obtained personal vindication, to a great extent, from listening to the words of one of those soldiers to-day in this Chamber. We now know, as the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] said a while ago, that, while we were taught to believe that this was a war for democracy, that it was a war to end war, we were deceived. It did not end war, and as the Senator from Indiana has said, and I can say it because I think I run no risk in repeating the words of a veteran of that war—other countries of the world and our own country have been worse off—thousands of times worse off—on account of that war.

I sat here as a Member of this body, Mr. President, while that war was on and listened to the speeches made by representatives of our allies across the sea. With others of my brethren here, I wiped away the tears that rolled down from my eyes on those occasions, and when I heard them tell of the noble purposes they had in view, how they were going to free the world from autocracy, how they were going to make the world at last respond to the sentiments and the heartbeats of the common people, I wondered, Mr. President, especially on one occasion when we were listening to the eloquent addresses of representatives of three of our allies, if I had been wrong when I voted against the declaration of war. I learned afterwards, however, Mr. President, that when we listened to the honeyed words of those representatives of our allies across the sea, pretending brotherhood of man and love of humanity, their pockets were bulging out at that very moment with secret treaties, concealed from us, by which they had agreed at the end of the war to divide up the world amongst themselves.

Mr. President, I have seen the things occur that eloquent Senators have described to-day. I believed at the time my vote was cast that war was wrong; I believed then we ought not to take that awful step; but I wondered if I felt that way because of early teachings when I was a child at my mother's knee, a widowed mother, who told me of the War between the States and how my brother, my only brother, had, even against her prayerful entreaties, gone to the front and there gave up his life in defense of the Government's cause. I wondered if that had not unconsciously perhaps moved me too far in my hatred of war; but when I see veterans now of the World War telling of the terrible carnage, when I read the history of the hell through which they had to go, I believe I did right. So whatever mistakes I may have made, Mr. President, I believe there is one act, if I am the only one in the world to say it, of which I may be proud, and that is my vote against the declaration of war.

Mr. President, the six Senators who voted against that declaration suffered a torture and a torment the world has never understood; the tale has never been told how they were hounded, how their footsteps were followed, how they were shadowed, how all manner of things were attempted to bring about their downfall and their ruin. I see one or two names on the list now before me, Mr. President, of men whose death, I know of my own personal knowledge, was hastened by the torments and the unjust criticism to which they were subjected on account of that vote.

I know of my own personal knowledge something about it. I have had my office searched; I have had my life since I left the cradle traced; my home in my absence has been hounded by the secret sleuths, sometimes by those of the Government of the United States, trying to find out something about my life that might be used to break me down.

It has its comic side, too, Mr. President. During the war, as I have said, many of these men came to my home; and one day in my absence one who came to my house, as many had done before, asked my wife all kinds of questions about my life and my history. On that one occasion my wife was asked whether it was not true that I had descended from German parentage; and, truthful and honest as she was, she had to tell the truth, and so she said to this sleuth: "Yes; his stepfather was a Pennsylvania Dutchman." [Laughter.]

Mr. President, we have heard here to-day about the way we compensated big business; it is all true, and it has been told in more beautiful language than I can command. We have heard how we paid and paid at once the railroads; that is true. I think some have mentioned, coming down to later days, the moratorium; that is true. Mention has been made how we opened up the Treasury of the United States when we established the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. It is all true; we did it all; and the things I have just mentioned we did under the leadership and the command of the President of the United States. We approved the moratorium, and did it by wire, when we were not assembled, in answer to the messages that came from the White House. We forgave $250,000,000 when we were in sad need of it, and when the debtor governments had the money ready with which to pay, and one of them, I understand, had already paid and had the sum refunded. That is all true. We provided for a direct appropriation of $500,000,000 for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, made directly from the Treasury. We provided for the issuance of bonds of that corporation to the amount of $1,500,000,000, guaranteed both as to principal and interest by the Government of the United States, so that they are the direct obligations of our Government. That is all true. That was all done for bigger business—corporations, railroads, banks.

Some of it did some good, I think. A man would be crazy indeed, if you would give him $500,000,000 in cash and securities for $1,500,000,000 more, if he could not do some good with it. But the depression keeps on. We have chased around all the corners in the country and have not yet overtaken prosperity. We have lavishly given the money and the credit of our Government to carry on these things; and now we are confronted with several thousand ex-soldiers asking that their compensation certificates be paid.

I am not disputing the justice of it. I was one of those who were in favor of paying it all at the time we issued the certificates. I would pay it all now if I thought we could do it without danger to our Government itself. The only defense I have personally, I want to say, is that I voted against and talked against and worked against every one of these things. I did not believe they were going to bring prosperity. I thought we were commencing at the wrong end. Instead of commencing with big business, I thought we ought to commence with the laboring class and the farmers of America, and let prosperity climb up, rather than to take the chance of having a few crumbs brushed off the mahogany-top tables while we would grovel on the floor and pick them up.

But that is done. It is over. That much of our credit is gone. Our Government is in that much worse fix than it was to begin with. And so, while I think it is proper, and I am not complaining of those who use it now as an argument in favor of this bill, I still believe that we can not make things right by piling another wrong upon the many wrongs which we must admit we have already committed.

As I understand, Mr. President, only about one-third of the unemployment can be traced to the veterans of the war. I am not claiming those figures are right, but that assertion has been made. I have not heard it contradicted. At least, we all know that unemployment is not confined to soldiers; and what I think would benefit these soldiers more than anything else would be to let them keep their certificates and give them jobs.

Jobs, Mr. President, is what the country needs for its unemployed. If there were no unemployed outside of the ranks of the veterans of the World War, I would not hesitate to vote for this bill; but that will not meet the question. It will still be staring us in the face; and I believe, as firmly as I believe anything, that if we pass this bill it will be an impossibility to pass an unemployment bill at this session of Congress. This will be used as an argument against it. This will be used effectively as an argument against it.

I think we could provide for unemployment in a way that would take care of all the veterans and everybody else; and in this crisis there is no difference between a veteran and a young man or a young woman who has come to maturity since the war. Our sympathies, perhaps, would be greater, because, if we are patriotic, regardless of the cause of the war, we certainly would have a sympathy for the man who bared his breast to the enemies of his country that we would not have for the ordinary citizen. I concede that; but when it comes to suffering, when it comes to taking care of those who are starving, when it comes to clothing the naked and warming those who are shivering with cold, there can be no distinction. The little child whose parents may have even been on the enemy's side of the world controversy must be cared for the same as the child of our own citizens if the child is here. We can not turn our eyes away from human suffering. In a country bursting with an oversupply of food we have millions of people suffering for the necessaries of life. In my opinion, the only thing that is going to alleviate this condition is an unemployment measure on a country-wide scale with billions behind it; and that means the soldiers who are here now asking for the passage of this bill will get jobs the same as everybody else.

I see no way to escape that conclusion. Much as I dislike to see my country issue bonds in time of peace, Mr. President, I think we will have to come to the conclusion that our country's life is in more danger to-day than it was either before or during the great World War. A great crisis confronts us now, and the crux of it all is this: Let men who want to work have work, so that they can buy the food the farmer produces; so that the men who are selling clothing and food will be able to hire clerks and pay them wages; so that the factories that will make the tools and the other machinery necessary to carry on a great unemployment campaign will all have their wheels started, and business will commence again, and in its thousands and thousands of ramifications, employment and prosperity will come up everywhere.

It is not a desirable condition, I admit, even to carry out that program; but if anybody has a better one, I should like to follow him. If anybody has any other plan that will give jobs to the unemployed, I should like to help him get it. While I have said before on the floor of the Senate that I thought it was a mistake for these soldiers to come to Washington and camp around the Capitol, although I said then that it was a free country and they had a perfect right to do it if they wanted to, I am reaching the conclusion now that the coming of this vast army is going to accomplish a world of good.

In the first place it has convinced the country, it has convinced Congress, it convinced everybody that these men are the highest type of citizenship; that these men, orderly and sober and industrious, are only asking for a right to live under the flag for which they fought. The way to let them live is to give them jobs. Let them keep the evidence of indebtedness that the Government of the United States owes them, to be paid in the future. Give them an opportunity to work. Give them an opportunity to earn something upon which to live and to support their families. That is what they need. That is what 99 per cent of them would rather have than anything else. Give them an opportunity—and, while you are giving it to them, give it to all their brethren in this country, whether soldiers or not—to work, to earn a living instead of becoming subjects of charity; to have jobs, to earn their own living, to earn their own money, and thus start the wheels of prosperity to turning.

If this will not work, if this will not do, then I do not know what will. If something of this kind will not work out, then our civilization is doomed. I see no escape from it, and I do not want to put anything in the way of bringing about that condition. I do not want to do an injustice to these soldiers; but I do not want even to do justice to them if by doing justice to them I do injustice to somebody else. They are like our other citizens who are unemployed. They want work, and we ought to see to it that they get work.

I claim no superior wisdom; but when I came back here last December, I introduced a bill providing for the issuance of $3,000,000,000 in bonds—perhaps that was not enough; perhaps that ought to be increased—to be used in public works. I do not like to do a thing of that kind. It is a sad commentary upon our Government when we are required to do it in time of peace; but I would rather give jobs to people, even though it is through the issuing of governmental bonds, than to feed millions in charity against their wish, if they could have their real will. I would rather issue bonds and give jobs than to issue bonds and use the money for charity; and that is what we will have to do. We have gone through one winter without taking the Federal Government into the picture, and it has strained the nerves and the capacity and the patriotism of all the charitably inclined people throughout the United States to carry on during that winter. They can not do it another winter. If we had started last December and enacted the necessary laws, we would have been able when spring came to put millions of men to work, and the scene we have to-day would not be here.

So, Mr. President, right or wrong, it seems to me that at least for the present we should not pass this legislation. I am not unmindful of what the Senator from Oklahoma said, and I want to say to him that if this bill is defeated and Congress does not do something for the unemployed, and if the President of the United States prevents it becoming a law when we do pass a bill looking to that end, then, as a last resort, I would give my approval to a measure of this kind.

At the present time I believe it would be a stone in the pathway of that kind of a program, and I am measuring my words, because I know that the same influences which have been mentioned by the Senator from Indiana, the Senator from Wisconsin, the Senator from Iowa, and the Senator from Oklahoma are opposed to the plan I am talking about. I realize that at the present time the Treasury of the United States is opposed to it. But these men have come over a great way since last December. Then the President of the United States was against the Federal Government doing anything of a constructive nature to help unemployment. Conditions have been growing worse. The resources which he called upon have been exhausted, and the Federal Government alone stands between destruction of our Government itself and some method by which the unemployed can be given an opportunity to earn an honest living.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I think it is well known that if you are going to fertilize a tree, you ought to fertilize at the root of the tree and not the top. If you put fertilizer on the top of a tree, you kill the tree. If you fertilize the root of the tree, the whole tree will grow and benefit. I make that statement because I fear that in so much of the relief legislation we have passed we have been fertilizing the top of the tree instead of the root.

I am going to vote for this bill, and I have no excuse for voting for it. I have some reasons. I am not going to vote for this bill because these veterans sit here in the galleries. No more orderly group of petitioners have appeared in Washington since I came here. It has been said in the newspapers that Senators have said they would refuse to vote for this bill so long as the veterans were here. I can not believe that such a statement has been made. For a Senator to make such a statement would be as improper as it would be for a judge to say he could not render a proper decision because interested parties sat in his court. If any Senator has made such a statement, I want to remind him that in years of service in the Senate I have heard no Senator say that he would refuse to vote for a banking measure because bankers sat in the galleries or for a tariff measure because manufacturers happened to sit in the galleries, or for any other measure because some beneficiaries might occupy seat in the galleries.

Mr. President, I want to assure you that I am not going to vote for this bill because of its popularity. I realize full well how unpopular it will be to vote for this bill. Vote against this bill, and the yelping crowd of propagandists will call you statesman.

I want to say a few words in opposition to the arguments which have been made against the bill. The main argument has been, for instance, that those who are in favor of it are inflationists and would destroy the credit of the Government and destroy business, and because I believe that is not so is my excuse for imposing upon the Senate for a very short time.

In the first place, I beg you to remember and bear in mind who it is who says this is inflation, and then look upon the record and see how well they are qualified to warn and to advise the Government of the United States on the question of inflation. The people who call this an inflationary measure inflated the credit system of this country from 1924 to 1929, until it blew up like an overinflated automobile tire or an overinflated balloon. They furnish the same financial leadership advising the Government of the United States to-day, and I claim they are not qualified, and by their fruits we have a right to judge them. I claim their own record has disqualified them as advisers of the Government of the United States on matters of this kind. Their continued advice, if followed, will wreck the country.

I am accused of being an inflationist. I have never been an inflationist, and I am not an inflationist now. When the orgy of inflation was started by the banks of the United States in 1924, in my humble way I tried to point out the dangerous road on which they were embarking and the serious consequences which would result. Not for the purpose of saying "I told you so" but to prove by my record that I have been opposed to inflation at a time when it was necessary to be opposed to inflation, I want to quote from the RECORD of the Senate under date of January 21, 1925. After addressing the Senate for more than an hour and a half on the policy which had then been inaugurated by those in control of the credit system of this country, I concluded with these words:

> It seems scarcely necessary to comment upon such a condition. The facts speak louder than any denunciations that can be framed. The facts are from ex cathedra sources—from New York leading financial authorities and from Federal reserve reports. They tell their own story to the country at large, the story of a Wall Street stock market "jamboree" financed by the United States Treasury. The check upon Wall Street control, the purpose for which the Federal reserve was originally created, has been destroyed, and the Government agency turned into a force to perpetuate and magnify the evil. The result is called prosperity of the American people and sound finance.

I quoted on that day from the Annalist, and Mr. Parker Willis, who said:

> H. Parker Willis, a former official of the Federal Reserve Board, in a special article published in the Annalist charges that the Federal Reserve Board has pushed into the market $1,100,000,000 by purchase of securities, and that besides this "open-market work" the Federal reserve banks, "under instructions of the Treasury," have forced into circulation as much of the gold coin in their possession as the market could absorb.

> Even now we know not what hour the bubble may burst and the 1924 stock inflation, like others before it, produce disaster to the many and endanger panic. The country will survive. It is the greatest and most enduring that man has happily created. But let us not trifle with the corner stone of its foundation—the faith of 100,000,000 people.

> We have had in the last few weeks an inflation of approximately $6,000,000,000 of paper profits, and the public is led to believe that it is all based upon a sound economic condition of the industries of the country. An unprejudiced survey of the earning power and production capacity of the industries of the country will convince anyone that what is going on now is not based upon any sound economic principle; that it is merely a repetition of what has taken place in the country many times before, an artificial stock speculation, the fleecing of the lamb, and after that comes the deluge of deflation with ruined business concerns and individuals all over the country.

So much for 1925. In 1924, when those in control of the credit inaugurated a policy of underwriting the debts of Europe, and financing the Governments of Europe, through the inflation of credit through Federal reserve banks, when the Federal Reserve Board made a rule by which they could deal in European trade acceptances—and, by the way, that was where about $800,000,000 of our banking funds were tied up last summer when we had the crisis which forced the so-called moratorium—at that time I said:

> Our international bankers are involving us more and more deeply in the chaos of Europe. Under a recent ruling by the Federal Reserve Board our Federal reserve banks will accept European trade acceptances for discount. This means the credit reservoir which is the property of the people of the United States is going to be tapped and a constant stream of banking credit is going to be poured out over Europe for the purpose of bolstering up the tottering financial houses of Europe. They are going to give European bankers credit and money that they denied to the American business and American farmers in 1920, 1921, and 1922.
> The Dawes plan is a gold brick loaded with dynamite. It provides for a loan of $200,000,000 to Germany so Germany can pay France, who owes us $4,000,000,000 which she refuses to pay. It is said that this money is to be loaned to the various countries of Europe in order to establish peace in Europe, in order that we shall have an end of war in Europe.

Remember this was in 1924:

> If this extension of credit is for peaceful purposes, why is it not provided in the contract that Europe shall disarm before she gets this money? Why is it not stipulated in the contract that the countries of Europe shall not spend money for armament and war? The President is quoted as saying that he intends to urge the American people to buy these securities in order that we may establish world peace. Some one is deceiving the people.
> It is said the reason for this new financial policy is the desire of the bankers to stimulate exports financed by American credits. We have had some painful experiences along these lines, but we seem to have forgotten the terrible price we paid for financing European purchases in America.

The Federal reserve system was set up to finance this Nation. By the action of the Federal Reserve Board it is now to be extended throughout the world. The property of the American people is to be used to finance merchants, bankers, and others in all the bankrupt nations of the world.

The banking credit of the British Empire, which has been the main source of supply for credit with which to bolster the tottering financial structure of Europe, is evidently exhausted, and the American resources are to be thrown into the breach in an attempt to stave off the impending financial crash there.

I see great danger in this move. It means that we shall have to carry additional burdens in Europe, and it may mean that we shall ultimately have to pay its debts. We are to pay for the imperialistic plans of unscrupulous politicians who have made the Versailles treaty an instrument of war.

REACTION PREDICTED

American bankers are gambling with trust funds belonging to others. They did it before and lost, and the American people are now paying the price. The deflation of 1920 was directly related to that said experiment.

The first result of this new scheme will be artificial stimulation of exporters and business. It may start an artificial business boom that will carry us until the election. It is also evident that the holding out of unlimited American credits to European nations is to be a club to force the acceptance by Europe of the Dawes plan and to compel the American producer to carry more of the European debt than he is already carrying.

When the first effect of this unwise policy wears off there will be a reaction that will strike a serious blow at our financial stability and our industrial prosperity. It may even be that we will become inextricably mixed up in the tangled web of European politics and finances.

So much for 1924. I warned against undue inflation at that time. I warn against undue inflation now. I want Senators to bear in mind, however, that overinflation of the credit system will wreak as much damage to the industries and to the finances of the country as an undue inflation of currency. A proper inflation of an automobile tire will make it function and last and carry one's car. A normal supply of credit, a normal supply of currency will have the same effect on the commerce and business and trade of the country. It is dangerous to overinflate both the credit system and the currency system, but those who are at all times ready and willing to overinflate the credit system hold up their hands in horror at the suggestion of a normal increase or expansion of the currency system.

On the one hand, the bankers control the inflation and deflation of the market. They hold the strings with which they can choke off the very life breath of the business of the country. They have the power to inflate and deflate, to make prices high or prices low. They have tried to inflate the credit system and credit currency for the last year and a half and failed to do it because the credit system is paralyzed due to overinflation and the resulting descending price level.

Now, to show that this will not be an undue inflation of the currency, let me point out from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States what it will mean so far as the currency is concerned. In 1920 there was a per capita circulation of currency or money in this country of $53.21.

If anyone wants to check up this statement, I will refer him to page 550 of the Treasury's report of the United States. It will be found in that report dated June 30, 1931. The per capita circulation in 1920 was $53.21. In June, 1930, the per capita circulation was $36.71. That means a contraction in the circulating medium of $16.50 per capita per 124,000,000 people. The addition of the proposed $2,000,000,000 in currency would barely restore the per capita contraction that has taken place since 1920.

On page 458 of the same report of the Secretary of the Treasury we find that the Federal reserve notes outstanding on June 30, 1920, were $3,405,877,000. On June 30, 1930, there were outstanding $1,746,501,000 of notes. During the 10 years there have been retired $1,659,376,000 of Federal reserve notes. In the meantime the population had increased from 1920 to 1930 by 17,000,000, showing that the proposed additional currency of $2,000,000,000 would barely meet the per capita contraction in Federal reserve notes during that time.

On page 548 of the same report it will be found that on June 30, 1920, there was a gold coverage of $35.12 for all money outstanding. On June 30, 1930, there was a gold coverage for all money of $54.59. In 10 years the gold coverage had increased $19.47 of gold in excess of what it was 10 years ago, an increase of 35 per cent, or equivalent to an increase of over 50 per cent of what it was in 1920.

The stock of gold in 1920 was $2,865,482,000. In 1931 it was $4,955,921,000. In 10 years the gold supply of coin and bullion holdings increased $2,090,439,000. The proposed currency issue would merely balance the increase in the reserve of gold, the purpose of which is to supply the increasing currency needs of the American people.

On page 510 of the same report it will be found that in 1920, on June 30, the public debt was $24,061,095,362. On June 30, 1930, the interest-bearing debts were $15,921,892,350. During the 10 years we have retired $9,139,203,012. The increased gold reserve was $2,000,000,000, and the decrease in interest-bearing debts was $9,000,000,000 in that period of time. The per capita debt in 1920 on June 30 was $228.32. On June 30, 1930, 10 years later, the per capita debt was $131.38, a 10-year reduction of $96.94 per head for 124,000,000 people. This alone should justify an increased currency per capita of at least one-fifth of the $96 debt per capita reduction.

In June, 1920, the per capita circulation for the United States was $57.35, so from June 30, 1920, to June 30, 1930, there was a decrease in per capita circulation of $20 for 124,000,000 people. That amounts to more than what would be the average increase in per capita circulation under this bill. There would still be as large a coverage of gold as there was for all money in 1920.

The venerable Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], whom we all love and respect, said he wants to give the veterans jobs and wants to give other people jobs. I would like to know where they are going to get the jobs. The policies that have been pursued by those in the leadership of industry and of finance and of government have been such that they have destroyed all possibility of increasing employment. Unemployment is increasing, the price level is going down, and every activity of the Government within the United States is gradually declining.

There were those who had hoped that when a bankers' corporation of $100,000,000 was organized it would support or stimulate the price of bonds. I ask them to observe that for the amount of bonds purchased the deposits in the banks of the United States declined, showing that bonds were being bought at the expense of the deposits in the banks. If anyone can restore prosperity in that way, I wish him good luck. He will need it.

It has been mentioned here that we voted out of the Treasury great sums of money for various enterprises. I do not question the good faith of those who voted for those measures. I voted against practically all of them. I voted against the cancellation of the debts to the foreign governments, which are costing this Government $500,000,000 a year in sinking fund and interest, and I voted against the moratorium and other measures because I thought those measures were unnecessary, economically unsound, and placed undue burdens upon the taxpayers of the United States. I could see no reason why the taxpayers of the United States should carry the burdens of the world. We have enough burdens of our own to carry.

I do not claim, nor do I believe, that the passage of this measure, if it should be signed by the President, will be a permanent cure of our economic troubles. If we pass this measure and pursue the policies that have brought about the depression, the remedy will be only temporary. It will give us a breathing spell to take stock of the causes of the depression and find the causes that brought it about and change the policies that brought it about.

I firmly believe that the bonus bill that was passed a year ago saved the situation to a large extent and that conditions now would have been far worse if we had not passed it, because the $1,000,000,000 that were borrowed on those certificates certainly must have paid at least $5,000,000,000 indebtedness.

The time must certainly now have come when it must be realized that prosperity can not be restored by reinflating the credit system. It can not now be done in that way, because confidence in the banking system has vanished, and credit is based entirely upon confidence. I believe that this is not an undue inflationary measure. There will be ample gold coverage, as is shown by the report of the Treasury; and it will do more to stimulate activity in business, not permanently but certainly far more effectively than can be accomplished by the vain endeavor to pump credit into a commercial system that can not now use the credit.

Mr. President, I want again to assure the Senate and those who sit in the gallery that I am not voting for this bill out of friendship or sympathy for the veterans. Sympathy will not do them any good; and in the Senate of the United States when I come to make a decision I can afford to have no friends—I can not afford to let friendship bias my judgment or my decision. I make this decision in cold blood, on an economic basis, on a foundation of belief that it is economically sound and will not be unduly inflationary, rather that it will be economically of benefit to the entire country; and if the veterans receive incidentally some benefit, that shall make me happy. I want to assure the Senate and the veterans that I am not voting for this measure because of the popularity of the measure with the veterans. Certainly no soldier is ever popular after the war is over.

For it's Tommy this an' Tommy that, an' "Chuck 'im out, the brute!"
But it's "Savior of 'is country" when the guns begin to shoot.

Then it's Tommy this an' Tommy that, an' Tommy, fall behind.
But it's "Please to walk in front, sir," when there's trouble in the line.

Then it's Tommy this an' Tommy that, an' Tommy, "'ow's yer soul?"
But it's "Thin red line of 'eroes" when the drum begins to roll.

It's Tommy this an' Tommy that, an' anything you please,
An' Tommy ain't a bloomin' fool—you bet that Tommy sees!

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I desire to make plain my position lest the vote which I am about to cast on this measure may be misinterpreted. As I view it, there are theoretically two courses open to be pursued in a major economic depression. One is to follow what may be termed deflation—of permitting the depression to run its course, which naturally is espoused during an economic readjustment of this kind by the creditor group since they stand to gain during all the course of such deflation, save only in the contingency that the economic structure itself shall be disrupted and destroyed.

The other course which may be followed, Mr. President, is one in which action by the Government as well as by those who are in positions of economic power is taken to check, to stem the tide of depression and deflation, and to turn the economic trend when the catharsis of the readjustment shall have taken place.

The reason, Mr. President, that I feel it incumbent upon me to make my position clear is because, in my judgment, the issue in regard to this measure has been confused; and while I acknowledge full well that many of the votes cast in the negative upon this roll call will be votes cast by those who sincerely espouse the course of deflation, I do not wish the fact that I may be forced to vote as those deflationists vote to be understood as indicating that I agree with their economic philosophy, either in times of depression or in times of prosperity.

Mr. President, when this depression began I tried as a Member of this body to point out that it was a major economic readjustment, cataclysmic in its potentialities, and that it would be greater in its effect than ever before experienced in this or any other country in the history of the civilized world.

During the course of this depression the Government—and I use that term because I wish not at this time to inject political considerations into this discussion—espoused the theory of deflation, of letting the depression run its course. I think I am justified in using the term "Government" because while the administration outlined and defined its policy it received the support on the side of the aisle occupied by the party that is normally and theoretically intended to function as an opposition under our 2-party system of government.

Like the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD], I tried during the period of inflation to point out its dangers and sought to persuade this body to take action in an effort to check it. At a time when brokers' loans, taken from the Federal reserve system contrary to the spirit if not the letter of the Federal reserve law, had reached the staggering total in January, 1928, of more than $5,000,000,000, I introduced a resolution in this body, and finally secured a report on it from the conservative Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate, calling on the Federal Reserve Board to exercise its power under the law by manipulation of the rediscount rates to shrink down that enormous concentration of credit being used for speculative, not for productive, purposes; thus hoping to avert the catastrophe which inevitably would follow failure to act in the crisis. The resolution was blocked, Mr. President, on the floor of the Senate by Members of both parties, and I was never able to bring it to a conclusion.

The concentration of credit for speculative purposes went on, and finally, after a general recession in business, there came the stock-market crash in 1929. The first act on the part of anyone in a position of responsibility in this Government was a statement by the President of the United States that conditions were fundamentally sound. It failed to check in its inception the deflationary process. Then Congress met in December and, after a hurried bipartisan conference at the White House, there was presented to the Senate a resolution characterized as a remedy for the situation prevailing. I wonder if Senators remember what it was. It was a joint resolution proposing to take $160,000,000 out of the Treasury of the United States and to refund it to the big income-tax payers and to the big corporations. When we challenged that proposal on the floor of the Senate we were answered by spokesmen on both sides of the aisle who were supporting it, with the statement that this was a psychological depression and that the refunding of this $160,000,000 would change the psychology and that soon the depression would be over.

For many long, weary months, which finally ran into years, Mr. President, those in positions of power and responsibility in the Government proceeded on the theory that the depression was due to psychological causes. They at first ignored it; they adopted the tactics of the ostrich; they stuck their heads in the sands; and, because they could not see what every other person could see who took the time or the pains to study the economic data available, they thought the depression was not going to last. Having failed, Mr. President, they minimized or attempted to minimize the seriousness of the depression.

The President of the United States on the 8th of March, 1930, issued his justly famous statement in which he said that after the most thorough investigation, with all the departments at his command, he had come to the conclusion that unemployment would be so drastically reduced within 60 days that it would not longer be a serious problem; and when waited on a few months later by a delegation composed of bankers and others who came to urge upon him a consideration of this problem and its menace, he informed them that they had come six weeks too late; that the situation was already well in hand. Convinced in this situation that the responsibility for leadership rested with Congress, I began in the third session of the Seventy-first Congress my efforts to direct the attention of this body to the serious problem of unemployment and its relief, which was one of the major problems of the depression.

On the 9th of January, 1931, I had this to say:

Mr. President, the Congress, like Nero, is fiddling while Rome burns.

The leadership in Congress, if any exists, should devote itself to the development of a program which will adequately meet this situation. First of all, obviously, we should see that food and clothing are provided for the drought sufferers. To throw the entire burden upon the Red Cross and to permit conditions to develop such as have been pictured here by the Senators from Arkansas is criminal negligence on the part of Congress.

Second, I think that the evidence which I have submitted to the Senate to-day and upon two previous occasions when I have spoken shows overwhelmingly that prompt action should be taken upon some measure to give direct relief to the unemployed and their dependents. The bill introduced by the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] which provides for a 50-50 appropriation by the Federal Government to relieve the cities of the excess burden which they have had to meet in providing relief for the unemployed should be enacted, or we should pass a measure which would enable the Red Cross to meet the situation.

Third, Mr. President, our public-works program for the next fiscal year should be expanded. Let us not be caught again next winter in the situation in which we now find ourselves. Let us provide for a sufficiently large public-building program so that during the next winter appropriations for public works and the plans and specifications and contracts will be ready so that the Federal Government may step in to relieve adequately the situation.

Fourth, Mr. President, some attempt should be made on the part of Congress to afford the means for the mobilization of the intelligence of industry and finance in order that it may be brought to bear upon the problem of solving the question of distribution, as it has been brought to bear during the last 10 years upon the problem of increasing the productivity of our present industrial organization. Unless we do that, Mr. President, economic conditions may be infinitely worse 12 months from now than to-day. We can not solve this problem through mergers. The recently announced plan for consolidation of the eastern railroads, as has been shown by the president of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co., will create economies largely at the expense of the employees. Consolidations or mergers of the kind proposed will add to the number of unemployed rather than reduce it. To follow such leadership will bring about a permanent unemployment problem which will be, if permitted to run its course, greater than that which has afflicted Great Britain during the years since the World War.

The administration having failed to meet this crisis, Congress should devote its energies during the coming weeks to the enactment of a relief program and to the passage of constructive measures for the prevention of unemployment in the future. The time has come for the Congress to assert its leadership.

Mr. President, despite all efforts that were made, it was impossible to secure action upon legislation at that session of Congress. When the present session met I introduced a bill to provide for a five and one-half billion dollar public-works program. I introduced a bill to provide for the creation of a national economic council; and, as is well known to Senators in this Chamber, I joined with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN] in making the fight last January for adequate unemployment-relief legislation. I am not frightened by the cry of inflation raised against this bill. It is the type of inflation provided I am not ready to accept. I have been trying for months to enact the five and one-half billion prosperity bond bill for public works, which would bring a controlled inflation.

Mr. President, why are these men here pressing for the enactment of this legislation? Largely due to the economic distress that prevails in every section of this country to-day. If there were employment for the men who are here, and for their comrades at home, who are demanding the passage of this legislation, there would not be any such demand for its passage. Therefore, by and large, the demand for the passage of this bill comes because there is widespread distress in the United States; and while from the beginning of this depression I have fought as valiantly as I knew how to bring the attention of Congress to the major character of this depression, and to urge upon its consideration the enactment of a program gigantic enough in size to check the downward trend of this spiral; while I have fought consistently for the proposition that the problem of unemployment relief in this country was a joint responsibility of the Federal Government as well as the counties, cities, and States, I can not bring myself to vote to extend relief solely to a group, who, no matter how deserving, are but the counterpart of millions of others in the United States who are likewise in distress through no fault of their own, and who are just as hungry, just as destitute, as are the men who are present in the galleries and in the city of Washington at this hour.

I think any person who has given serious consideration to the problem of unemployment relief will admit that the payment of relief in lump sums is not a sound or economical distribution of that type of relief. These men have had experience with that type of allotment, because many of them have already taken advantage of the privilege extended at the last session of Congress to secure a 50 per cent loan upon the certificates; and despite the fact that many, if not most, of those who are present here have borrowed 50 per cent of the value of these certificates, they are to-day, only a year after we enacted that legislation, in as destitute circumstances as are millions of other citizens who did not have the credit resources with which to obtain a loan.

Furthermore, Mr. President, there are 827,000 of these certificates outstanding to-day upon which not a dollar has been borrowed. I think it is safe to assume that the great majority of those 827,000 who have not borrowed upon their certificates are not in need of funds at this time; and I, for one, can not vote to make a lump-sum payment to 827,000 persons in this country who I think it is fair to assume do not need this relief when there are millions of citizens in the United States who are in the direst necessity.

Mr. President, I hate to say it, but as the result of the study which I have made of this depression I am convinced that it is one which will be of long duration. The problem that confronts us at this hour will grow increasingly worse by geometric progression. Staggering as was the problem of unemployment relief during the past winter and as it is at this very hour, it will be a much more staggering burden next winter, and, I fear, in the winter to follow it.

While I have not joined in what seemed to me an exaggerated overemphasis of the necessity for balancing the Budget and for maintaining the credit integrity of the Govment, because I never thought it was in danger, I do say that in a long period of depression there is an X amount of credit which the Government can obtain and make available for the protection of itself and its citizens. I do not know how much that amount is, and neither does any other living man in or out of this Chamber; but, convinced as I am that this depression will go on, and that most enormous demands will be made upon this Government not only for direct relief but for public works to provide employment, and conversant as I am with the problem of unemployment relief, I can not vote to mortgage $2,400,000,000 of that X amount which may be raised during the next 5 or 10 years to meet the exigencies of the situation.

Therefore, Mr. President, like the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], I feel that I am here confronted with a choice between relief to unemployed in the United States and their dependents, regardless of whether they served in the war or not, and the enactment of a gigantic public-works program on the one hand, and on the other hand the passage of this bill to give relief to the ex-service men.

Mr. President, I believe that the Senators who oppose this bill, if there be any, because they have discounted the significance of the social manifestation of the presence of this Bonus Expeditionary Force in Washington, are doing themselves and the country a disservice. In my judgment, this Bonus Expeditionary Force is merely a dramatic and a significant indication of the widespread distress under which citizens all over the United States are to-day suffering. I have talked to many of these men. They are a cross section of the backbone of the citizenship of this Republic. They are men who have normally been employed, who under normal conditions owned their own homes, or at least had title to them, and were buying them on the installment plan. Most of them have families—at least, those that I have seen. They are respected citizens of the communities from which they come. They have joined in this personal appeal only because all of their other resources have been exhausted, and they have turned to Washington to appeal for the passage of this legislation because they are in the direst necessity and it is their last hope.

I want to pay tribute to these men and the manner in which they have conducted themselves while in Washington, and I want also to say that I believe that they were but exercising the right of petition which is guaranteed in the Constitution of the United States.

As I stated the other evening in private conversation with an individual who made a slurring remark about these men, I have been interviewed by many of them, and I think they compare most favorably in their conduct and spirit with many of the individuals who interviewed me when the tax bill was under consideration and who desired to be relieved of the additional taxes to be imposed.

Mr. President, I shall continue to fight for Federal unemployment relief legislation, and for the enactment of a public-works program of gigantic proportions to care for all the unemployed, including the ex-service men. It is a matter of infinite regret to me that I am forced, for the reasons which I have stated, to deny at this time and in its present form the appeal for relief which has been made by the ex-service men who have come to Washington to ask for the passage of this legislation.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, following the moving address of the great Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and the persuasive remarks of the able Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], with both of whom I am in substantial accord, it would appear to be idle further to address the Senate on this subject. Nevertheless, as the representative of a sovereign State, with definite national responsibilities, some explanation will be given of the reasons for my vote.

From the most painstaking and patient examination possible, and without commitments with respect to any future consideration of the same subject, I have reluctantly concluded that public duty compels me to vote against the bonus proposal at this time and in the form in which it is now presented.

Chief among the reasons for the decision are these:

First. From the outset of the present session of Congress disinterested men and women have recognized—and I have accepted as my foremost public responsibility at this session of Congress—the overwhelming necessity for relief legislation not narrowed to any selected group or groups but general in its nature and fairly distributed according to population and individual need. It is becoming clearer that we have now, and all too long have had, not merely 3,000,000 veterans but approximately 12,000,000, including veterans unemployed, and more or less in want. Surely in such an unparalleled peace crisis the Nation ought not to play favorites. Any national relief program—and Congress, as just urged by the Senator from Wisconsin, owes a duty to the country to adopt a real one before it adjourns—should be concerned with the country's entire problem.

Second. The present bill for veterans' relief, if adopted, will be used to arouse frantic, overburdened taxpayers to smother the hopes of the larger number of deserving other millions for whom in time of peril the Nation's full safeguarding powers should be equally and wisely mobilized.

Third. Those who control our national banking and credit structure predict and in instances threaten and, unfortunately, hold the strategic position to precipitate even worse financial disasters than those of the past three years if the legislation now pressed is adopted. Faced by the likelihood of such a catastrophe, should we not build back toward fugitive prosperity by means of carefully expanded credit through general relief and national public-works construction programs rather than subject the country to the danger of further credit shocks, whether deliberately or otherwise precipitated? The men now crowding this city and Chamber, beyond their immediate needs, want and should have work above all else; and the force of the argument for a sound public-works program is increased when it is remembered how the earlier bonus payment passed without the business stimulation promised by its advocates.

Difficult as our decision may be, it is profoundly hoped that to-day's legislative crisis may prove a vital turning point in a new forward movement aided by our country's best experts to build America without delay on sounder national and international foundations. After extending inevitable temporary relief Congress should at once advance through necessary public works and well-planned farm and other industrial organization and development under government toward reborn and better-rooted prosperity. Let us hope that this test of self-governing ability to which America is now inescapably summoned will be shouldered with nobler selflessness and deeper humanity-loving wisdom than our leadership has yet exhibited.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I desire to make only a brief statement. I have reached the conclusion that at the present time I should vote against the pending bill to pay to the veterans of the World War their adjusted-service certificates in its present form.

I desire to say that in reaching this conclusion I have not been frightened at all by the suggestion of an inflation either of currency or credit. Indeed, I would welcome a properly controlled expansion of the currency, and especially of the credit. I have reached the conclusion because I have come to the fixed opinion that before this session of Congress is adjourned a building program or construction program large enough to give employment to a large percentage of the unemployed people in the United States should be undertaken.

I have not hastily reached the conclusion to vote against the bill at this time in its present form, because I have supported uniformly, over a period of nearly 10 years, legislation for the veterans. I believe it would be a fatal policy to adopt at this time a program of partial relief for the unemployed of the United States, and because I have arrived at the conclusion that a large program should be undertaken, and before adjournment, and because I believe that piecemeal efforts to relieve the general unemployment in the United States, including unemployment of veterans and nonveterans alike, would retard rather than promote a general program of relief and employment, I have concluded that I should vote against the pending bill in its present form and at this time.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, on the question of the effect of this measure on the credit situation, I desire to present to the Senate a statement contained in a letter to me from Walter F. McCaleb, president of the American Home Builders, of Cleveland, Ohio, an acknowledged financial authority. That statement is as follows:

> This veterans' bonus bill will help vastly in turning into the channels of trade some liquid credits, and to some extent start the currents flowing again. We must have additional credits. The dollar must be reset, otherwise it will not be economic chaos but utter economic collapse.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate to another statement included in a letter to me from Mr. Robert M. Harriss, of New York City, a prominent student of financial affairs, which is as follows:

> In my opinion and the opinion of many banker and economist friends that I value, payment of the balance of the adjusted-compensation certificates would not only be a godsend to the needy veterans, but, more important, through currency expansion, it would quickly stop this devastating deflation and prove of immeasurable benefit to our entire country.

Mr. President, I desire briefly to contrast the treatment accorded the railroads with the treatment so far accorded the veterans.

When it became necessary to draft the railroads for the more effective performance of our part in the World War, they were guaranteed a compensation equal to their average annual operating income for the preceding three fiscal years. Where they had been earning no income, or where for any reason that basis was shown to be impracticable or unfair, adjusted compensation was assured them.

In addition the agreements under which the railroads were shifted to Government control provided for maintenance, repairs, renewals, depreciation, and for such adjustments of operating income and Government contribution as would secure the return of the railroads at the end of the war to their owners in substantially as good repair and with substantially as complete equipment as was the case at the beginning of such control.

Under Government control the wages of railway workers were substantially increased. Manufacturing concerns which had been called upon to supply war materials were voted hundreds of millions of dollars by way of adjusted compensation to preserve them against losses incurred by virtue of war operations.

How different the situation with the human beings who were called upon to suffer and to die for the flag. They were drafted at $1 a day plus Army rations of clothing and food, when those who stayed at home were receiving for ordinary labor from three to five times the equivalent of that pay and allowance. Furthermore, our soldiers sustained heavy personal losses in many instances, endured separation from loved ones as well as the disruption of business or of education, perished by tens of thousands in a foreign land, were wounded and disease stricken by tens of thousands, were condemned to disablement and loss by hundreds of thousands, faced loss of employment, privation, and want on their return to civil life by millions, and those who survive and still waiting, after a lapse of 14 years, for the performance in full of the moral obligation resting on this Government to accord them a readjustment and correction of the economic and financial inequalities under which they were summoned to the service of their country.

Mr. President, these are some of the reasons which move me to support the present bill.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, the most important question, and the one asked most frequently and never satisfactorily answered as yet in the discussions on this legislation to pay the full-face value of the adjusted-service certificates at present is, Where shall the Treasury of the United States obtain the money with which to make this payment?

Regarding the discussion that the issue of Treasury notes in 1890 had no basic metal behind it or in which they could be redeemed, I wish to say that I am informed by the office of the Treasurer of the United States that this issue of notes in 1890 was for the purchase of silver bullion under the act of July 14, 1890.

The act also provided for the coinage of the silver purchased into standard silver dollars.

Up to 1893, when the act was repealed, $156,000,000 in notes were issued, and this issue was always backed up by the silver bullion purchased or by the silver dollars coined from it, which were held in the Treasury as a reserve to redeem the notes at any time. Only a small amount remained in circulation, $1,263,150 on April 30, 1930.

Money is not made, and Congress can not create a gold dollar any more than it can create a new constellation in the heavens. Gold must be discovered as other basic metals are by the geologist, and taken from the crevices of the rocks or washed from the gravel in the valleys. It is not made and can not be created any more than can coal or iron or any of the basic metals.

The reason for the adoption of the basic metal gold for our monetary standard is due to its value and because of its value in exchange for commerce and trade, it does not have to be redeemed. Gold is the redeemer; it never depreciates, and it can not be depreciated for the reason that its value is based upon its cost of production, and its utility.

It has been and is now claimed that money is the creature of law. The method advocated by some in Congress to pay the soldiers' bonus is an example. Should the bonus bill that is now before us pass and become an actuality, we would by law create an obligation. This obligation would be a certificate in the way of a piece of paper, backed by no security other than the promise to pay. Like any other note, there would be no value behind it. This is the only kind of money that possibly could be the creature of law. It would be fiat money, not based upon our basic standard of money, which is gold coin.

It is just as impossible to make money by law as it is to make wheat or corn or potatoes by law. Were it possible for Congress to make money by law, why would it be necessary to collect tax. I am sure if it were possible for Congress to make money, each and every Congressman would be ambitious to make each and every voter, who sent him to Congress, a multimillionaire, and this he would do were it possible for Congress to make money by legislation.

Greenbacks and all other paper money are certificates of indebtedness. They are mediums of exchange or circulation, made so by law to facilitate trade and commerce. These paper certificates are negotiable, by the individual possessing them, for the payment of debts. They evidence the fact that they are redeemable by the Government of the United States in gold and silver. In other words, they have something behind them in the way of a redeemer in basic metals whose intrinsic worth and value can not be destroyed. Especially is this true of gold coin, where each and every dollar represents 23.22 grains of pure gold.

The Government does not make money. The Government is a taxgatherer. Every citizen under the flag pays tribute to it in the numerous ramifying methods of taxation, directly and indirectly in payment of tariff and in income taxes.

Congress has fixed our monetary standard on a basis that does not fluctuate, and as long as it remains so there can not possibly be a depreciated or fiat dollar under the American flag.

We even hear the statement made that we can make money out of some other kind of material. Assuredly this can be done, but one must put a dollar's worth of material in the proposed dollar, whether it be silver, paper, iron or copper, or what not. We can not make a negotiable dollar without having the value in it or without having the certificate that represents the dollar guarantee that the value is somewhere deposited for its redemption.

The only and best security that such redemptions exist when promise-to-pay money is circulated is the Treasurer of the United States, who holds these securities. If the Treasurer of the United States is authorized to issue certificates to pay the soldiers' bonus, and if they are put into circulation without a medium for redemption, it would unquestionably mean inflation, and inflation will result in cheap money. It will mean depreciated money, and money which the Congress of the United States should not want to pay to those who fought bravely for their country. It is not the sound way to redeem the bonus certificates that were issued as an additional payment, on which the Government has loaned 50 per cent of the value, and which the Government promised to redeem 20 years from date of issue in sound money.

We may ask, What is the value of the silver dollar? How can it be redeemed? A silver dollar contains 371.25 grains of silver. Silver to-day is selling on the market for 27 cents an ounce. The intrinsic value of the silver in a silver dollar to-day is 21 cents.

The reason why the value of the silver dollar is maintained over the market price of the same amount of silver is due to the guaranty of the Government to redeem the silver dollar on a parity with the gold dollar. There are stored in the vaults of the Treasury 494,000,000 silver dollars to redeem on demand the silver certificates in circulation. There are 34,000,000 silver dollars in circulation.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Robert Ingersoll once said that a good paper dollar is one which is able to declare "I know that my redeemer liveth."

Mr. HATFIELD. I thank the Senator from Colorado for his contribution.

This same question may be asked relative to the different series of greenbacks. Greenbacks were first issued in 1862. Congress provided for their redemption in 1879. They are redeemable in gold or silver at any time they are presented to the Treasurer of the United States. The highest amount outstanding at any time was $449,338,902 on January 30, 1864. This amount was gradually reduced until the act of May 31, 1878, which required the notes to be reissued when redeemed. Since that time the amount outstanding has remained $346,681,016. They are now known as United States notes and are protected by a gold reserve of approximately $156,000,000 held in the Treasury. The reserve notes that are issued by the Federal reserve system have behind them 40 per cent in gold. The remainder is represented in gilt-edge securities which facilitates their circulation in commerce and trade as well as assures their redemption.

Gold is our standard and the intrinsic value and worth is based on its cost of production. Its value is not increased by coining. The gold dollar can be defaced and yet it will have the same value that it had before defacement.

It is ofttimes argued that our money is being made valuable by being used as legal tender. Gold is not given value by being made legal tender, but it was due to its value that it became legal tender. It is coined with its value stamped thereon as a matter of accommodation so it will not be necessary for it to be tested by a chemist or weighed in the scales.

The issue of certificates of indebtedness under the Patman bill or the Thomas bill may produce in this country a medium of circulation that at the present hour has no method of redemption. Only one thing could result and that would be cheap money which would find its way at 10 and 15 cents more or less on the dollar, in many instances, to those who are in a position to store it away until the time of its redemption, when taxpayers would assume the burden or until this Government would follow in the wake of those governments who have tried the issue of fiat money.

To issue bonds by the Federal Government and place them with the Federal reserve system would mean nothing in the way of additional money. The only way to redeem the certificates that are authorized to be issued by these bills would be to sell the bonds in the market primarily, and take the proceeds to redeem the certificates, thereby adding whatever is necessary in the way of a bond issue to our national debt.

If we pass these measures, we provide that the issue be a legal tender. They shall be received in full payment of debts, both private and public; yet there is no gold or silver bullion or other securities to assure the redemption of the certificates as is the case with the issue of other paper money. What must be the result? Unquestionably, cheap money, with the circulated medium depreciated to whatever trade or business cares to make it before they will accept it as a medium of exchange.

This was the case after the Civil War when the greenbacks were issued and in 1876 to 1878 were selling for 34 cents on the dollar. Should these certificates depreciate in value 25 or 50 per cent of their face value, yet in keeping with these statutes, practically everyone could pay his obligations by means of this cheap money. In case he owed $5,000 to his banker, he could pay it with $2,500. If Congress adopted a law on the theory that a bushel of wheat should weigh 30 pounds instead of 60 pounds, and a neighbor would borrow from his farmer friend 2,000 bushels of wheat, the borrower of this wheat could, under the law, pay his friend in full discharge of his obligation to him, 1,000 bushels of wheat, by taking advantage of this new method of determining values. The same principle, Mr. President, would apply should the notes authorized under the bill now before the Senate be issued, due to the fact that there would be no basic metal behind them. So there is no reason why these certificates should not meet with the same fate that the greenbacks met with after the close of the war between the States.

I am convinced that Congress would not want to pay the veteran in fiat money which is not backed by gold or silver and thus can not be redeemed.

In my opinion, there are only two ways in which the soldiers' bonus could be paid. The first is by a bond issue. The bonds so issued would necessarily have to be sold in the market; the money thus obtained would have to be used to redeem the service certificates and the taxpayer in the future would be required to redeem the bonds at maturity, just as the bonds amounting to $21,432,000,000 which evidenced the obligation of the Government of the United States in the prosecution of the World War are gradually being redeemed.

I am informed that the Government has acknowledged that bonds for the purpose of redeeming these service certificates can not be sold at an advantage by the Federal Government at the present time, and even could they be sold, their redemption and interest payments would work an additional hardship to the American taxpayer who is already overburdened by the passage of the recent tax bill which will exact a toll of $1,136,000,000.

The other method for the redemption of these certificates, Congress has already invoked by creating a sinking fund to take care of both the principal and interest over a period of years.

I had no hesitancy in voting in the Seventy-first Congress to authorize the Treasurer of the United States to loan 50 per cent of the value of these service certificates; I shall have no hesitancy in voting at some time during my term in Congress for the full payment of the service certificates, when the taxpayer can afford to assume this extra obligation; but I am unwilling to vote for a futile gesture, for, should the bill become a law, it would mean cheap money, and we would suffer the experience which we had following the war-time prosperity of our contest for independence, and again during the period of inflation following the Civil War, culminating with the "black Friday" of 1869. This is the least that could happen to the financial fabric of our Government. It would be harmful to everyone and would be more destructive than the ravages of a great war or of a pestilence.

Mr. President, I have voted whole-heartedly for every piece of constructive veterans' legislation that has come before this body for consideration since I have been a Member of it. I did so because I was convinced that such legislation was just and equitable. I served the veterans before I came here, both in the Army and in private life, and I have never hesitated to give in a professional way in case of illness when they had no money to pay for hospitalization. I stand here to-day their friend and shall continue to be their friend. I am in full accord with legislation which will protect them and their families in the hour of want or in afflictions due to disability contracted while in the service of their country.

I am for the payment of the service certificates as soon as it is fair to the taxpayer to ask him to assume the burden. They should have been paid when the obligation was recognized by Congress. I take it, however, that those who visioned the legislation that resulted in the authorization of the soldiers' service certificates, or bonus, had in mind a reserve in the way of insurance for the veteran by the creation of a service certificate which would mature at a time when he would have reached the declining period of life, and which would, in case of his passing before that time, provide something for those dependent upon him. Such a conclusion impresses me as being full of wisdom, as protection is afforded such as the head of the average American family tries to provide for those to whom he is responsible in the way of insurance, should misfortune overtake him.

Comparatively speaking, the Congress has been most considerate of the American veteran. We are told that more has been done in the way of remedial legislation than has been done by all the other nations combined which took part in the World War.

Mr. President, a depression exists of such proportions as to affect us all. The conditions existing in the world to-day are the natural consequence of the awful ravages of the World War. Will it be helpful either to the soldier who served his country or to the workingman who stayed at home and kept the home fires burning, and who is now also out of employment, to place upon the taxpayer an additional burden by the adoption of this legislation?

If this measure shall be passed will we not seal the fate of the Government and force it off the gold standard and cause it to become one of the cheap-money nations?

These are momentous problems for our consideration; and when we once embark upon such a course, who knows the ending or the final audit of results?

Had Congress commandeered business during the war period, then the picture that presents itself to-day would possibly not be seen. There would be a different story to tell. Eighteen billion dollars of American money invested in foreign securities in all probability would not have been squandered. These billions of dollars in private loans to Europeans and the eleven billions in loans by our Government to the governments of Europe will serve as an experience long to be remembered. Let us hope that future generations may profit by our experience in philanthropy and service in a war beyond the seas, which has proved so costly to the American people.

Had industry been commandeered as was man power of our country at the beginning of the war the American soldier would not now be looking for the payment of his service certificate because of the economic situation which confronts him and his home.

The die has been cast, Mr. President; we can not pass retroactive legislation to cover the mistakes, if any were made, to cure present ills.

I am not willing to vote, Mr. President, to add to the burdens of our Government. I am not ready to cast a vote that will mean $2,400,000,000 of tax burdens to the American people. I am not ready to vote for fiat money to pay the American soldier for the service he rendered in a foreign war on foreign soil. He deserves to be paid in sound and honest money when his service certificates shall be redeemed.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends." If without irreverence I may paraphrase these sublime words that fell from the divine lips of the Son of God, I venture to say that greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his country.

No poor words of mine can express the love, the gratitude, in the heart of America for her patriotic sons and daughters, soldiers, sailors, who offered or who gave their lives that their country might live. The War of the Revolution, the War of 1812, the unhappy War between the States—and I pause to say, with gratitude, that Mason and Dixon's line has been taken up and wrapped around the hearts of the American people, so that to-day east and west, north and south, we are, indeed, one people, with one love, with one purpose, all loyal brothers and sisters beneath the undefeated flag of the Republic—the war of 1898 with Spain, the late great World War, each and every of these wars called into the service of the country patriotic men and women, and America has endeavored to show its appreciation, its gratitude, its love, which is the greatest thing in the world, for those who offered or who gave their lives in the service of their country.

America to-day feels deeply for those who sleep and for those who wake who served their country in the late World War. No tribute can be too earnest, no words can be too eloquent to express America's appreciation for those who sleep, and no words, no eulogy, can express the appreciation, the gratitude, the love of America for those that survive, who gallantly served our country during the late Great War. We have endeavored to be just and generous toward those who survive and toward the widow and the orphan of those who sleep. We have spent millions, billions, indeed, toward hospitalization in aid of the sick, the wounded, the widow, the orphan, and we stand ready now to do all that is possible for those who need assistance.

Unhappily to me and to others, regretfully the Government is not in a position financially, economically, to make it possible for us to do all that we would gladly do. Millions were called into the public service; many went abroad; many stood ready willing to go if called. Since the war was ended—to repeat myself but to detain the Senate for only a moment longer—we have spent millions of dollars in the way I have briefly suggested. Among other things done in recognition of patriotic service rendered, we issued certain so-called compensation certificates, delivered, accepted, payable at a certain future date.

The privilege of borrowing on these certificates was limited by the first law to 25 per cent of their then value. Later I gladly voted to increase that borrowing privilege to 50 per cent. I am advised that of the total number of certificates issued and delivered, approximately two-thirds of the holders have exercised the privilege of borrowing, and that approximately one-third of the holders of those certificates have not exercised that privilege.

These outstanding certificates are the legal obligations of our Government; and I am assuming—I know—that the boy of California, holder of one of these certificates, who went to the front, willing to die for his country, is just as patriotic to-day as he was then. I know that he appreciates the difficulties the Nation now has to meet its outstanding present obligations.

I realize those obligations; and, for reasons which have been elaborated here, some of which appear in the report of the Committee on Finance, I have regretfully come to the conclusion that I can not vote for this bill in its present form.

I do not rise for the purpose of seeking favor or of averting disfavor; I rise to say that under present conditions of our country—which we are striving to serve—under present conditions we can not with safety, without peril, immediately raise or pay the amount called for in this bill. That amount is near or approaching two and one-half billions of dollars.

We have a great country territorially, made up of many peoples. I love to believe that we are absolutely homogenous and all loyal. I have seen nothing in recent days, nor do I now see anything, that savors of disloyalty to the Nation—nothing whatever. Men have a right to petition; men have a right to appeal; men have a right to argue their cause; and they have a perfect right in person to present themselves in behalf of their cause.

I see nothing of a disloyal character in any manifestations in favor of the passage of this measure; but we are confronted with the necessity of carrying on the Government, meeting its obligations, caring for the sick, caring for the wounded, caring for the widow, the orphan, resultant of the wars that are gone. Nor am I a pessimist or an alarmist. I regret hearing words uttered in this Chamber suggestive that this Republic is in danger. This Republic is not in danger. There is not a man in Washington, or elsewhere, asking for relief who is not a loyal citizen. I have perfect faith and confidence in the stability and the future of this Republic. I repeat, Mr. President, I regretted listening to words suggestive that some great danger threatened us, or some great danger hung over us, and that this mighty Republic—this Republic of Washington and of Lincoln, this "Government of the people, by the people, and for the people"—I regretted that anyone should doubt its stability, or think that there is any danger of the dissolution or the overthrow of this Republic, made up of 48 patriotic States and standing unafraid beneath the undefeated Stars and Stripes.

We have been struggling, I repeat, with the difficult problem of meeting outstanding obligations and the cost of the Government, amounting at this time to some $4,000,000,000 annually. The revenues of the Government, in round figures, are but $2,000,000,000. To the end that we might balance the books, maintain the credit of the Republic, and carry out the obligations we have assumed, we have been looking toward the reduction of the cost of government upon the one hand and looking upon the other for sources of increased revenue, all to the end that we might balance the books, or—to use the phrase so often employed—balance the Budget. What that phrase means is simply that we will balance the books so that the income, the revenues of our Government, may discharge the fixed and continuing obligations of the Government; and we have struggled, and are struggling, to bring about that balancing of the books.

So, for the reasons which have been here amplified, some of which appear in the report of the Finance Committee, I reluctantly, and—need I repeat—regretfully have come to the conclusion that I can not, and I venture to say with the utmost respect for those who may differ from me, we can not now take upon ourselves the great and immediate obligations which would come to us from the passage of this particular measure in its present form.

All measures that have come before this body which have had to do with soldier relief, hospitalization, increasing the privilege of borrowing on these certificates, I have cheerfully supported. I hesitate to say this, because it may seem in the nature of self-praise or self-glorification; but I wish to add that all relief measures calling for additional expenditures which the Government can with safety meet and discharge, I stand ready to support by voice and by vote.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I appreciate the fact that the hour is getting late. Everybody in this Chamber is anxious to have a vote. I shall not take very long in what I have to say.

I am not going to find fault with anybody in this Chamber who takes a view opposite to that which I entertain with reference to this matter. I must confess, however, that I never expected the time to come when I would hear somebody rise in the United States Senate and say that the Government of the United States could not make money, or that gold never depreciated.

Gold, if you please, like everything else, appreciates or depreciates in value with relation to other commodities. If commodities are cheap, gold appreciates in value. If commodities are dear, gold depreciates in value. The trouble with the Government of the United States to-day—and not only in the United States but in the world at large—is the fact that there is not enough gold in the world to transact the Government's business or the commerce of the world. For that reason gold is extremely dear; and the important thing that we have to do in the United States of America at this time is to depreciate the present value of the dollar with relation to commodity prices.

In other words, the most important thing that is before the American people is how to raise the level of commodity prices so that the farmers and the debtors of all kinds can pay off their indebtedness with the same kind of dollars that they borrowed when they incurred the indebtedness in 1926, 1927, 1928, or 1929.

Mr. President, ever since this session of Congress opened I have maintained consistently that it was the duty of the Congress, under the Constitution of the United States, to try to stabilize the dollar in the United States. If that is not the purpose and the duty of the Congress under the Constitution, then we might as well adjourn sine die.

We were told, and I repeat what I said a few days ago, that when we passed the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill that immediately that would stop the deflation that was going on; that that would put money into circulation; that that would help the credit of the country; but it did not stop the deflation and did not help the credit of the country.

Then we were told, when we passed the Glass-Steagall bill, that that would immediately put more money into circulation, and that it would start the smoke coming out of the factories and would increase the prices of commodities.

I heard just to-day one of the distinguished Senators say, "If you cheapen your money, you are going to reduce wages." Of course, to some extent that is true; but what is the best thing to do? Is it better to let 10,000,000 people walk the streets of this country, or is it better to raise the commodity prices, and thereby put those 10,000,000 people back to work?

A short time ago I talked with the president of one of the largest industrial companies in the United States of America. He was likewise an executive director of one of the greatest banks in the United States. He said to me, "Unless you can raise the commodity price level of commodities in this country, instead of having 8,000,000 people out of employment, you will have 18,000,000 people out of employment by next winter."

Mr. President, we have not in the Congress of the United States done one solitary thing of any moment to put these men back to work.

I am not going to tell of my love for the veterans, because I want to say that I do not love these veterans one iota more than I love the rest of the working men of this country who are walking the streets to-night. They are not entitled, in my judgment, to very much more sympathy than the rest of the men who are walking the streets. I am not appealing to the prejudices of these people. I am not going to appeal to you on the ground that when you sent them off to war, bands were playing and flags were waving, and everybody was telling them what to do. I do not think that is the proper argument to make in this body at this time.

I have sat here and waited and waited and waited to see some kind of legislation proposed which would put men to work in this country, and nothing has been done.

When the great Republican Party met out in the city of Chicago, I said that at last, when that great body of prominent individuals met out there, they would certainly come forward with some plan, with some program, to put men to work, and to bring about the return of prosperity in this country. But we look in vain in their platform to find anything of a constructive nature. Let me read what they say about it. They recognize, for the first time, perhaps, what the real situation is in the country; and if I were going to criticize the President of the United States, I would do it on the ground that his course hitherto has been because there was a lack of foresight on his part, that he never visualized what the real situation in this country was in 1929, in 1930, in 1931, or in 1932. But when the Republican Party met out in Chicago, they did not say that at this time prosperity was just around the corner, they did not say that we would have a return of prosperity in 60 days' time, nor did they offer any solution for the economic chaos in which we find ourselves to-day. They did say, however:

> The supremely important problem that challenges our citizens and Government alike is to break the back of the depression, to restore the economic life of the Nation, and to bring encouragement and relief to the thousands of American families that are sorely afflicted.

Mr. President, that is the first time the representatives of the President of the United States have really gone on record as recognizing the economic condition of this country.

Listen to their plan for recovery:

> The people themselves, by their own courage, their own patient and resolute effort in the readjustment of their own affairs can and will work out the cure.

Mr. President, that is the statement of a defeatist, that is the statement of one who has no remedy, and who has no constructive ideas, but simply says that the people of this country must go on and on, that we must continue with this period of deflation, and that they have no program in mind, and no program which they dare to offer to the American people to help them out of this era of depression and chaos.

I say that is a sad commentary on the so-called statesmen who met out in the Chicago convention to offer to the people of the country nothing but a defeatist program, and to say to the people, "Go home, be patient, and suffer."

I agree with those who said upon the floor of the Senate that we ought to provide work rather than give money to these ex-soldiers. If I could see a ray of hope in this Congress that some means would be found to put more money into circulation other than by the method here proposed, I would not vote for the pending bill. If some proposal should be offered by those who have spoken, and I felt sure that we could pass such legislation and give employment to the men on the streets to-night, and to the veterans, I would not vote for this legislation. But nothing has been offered, and every program that has been suggested for the purpose of putting men to work, public construction, bond issues for that purpose, has been denounced by the identical crowd who are denouncing the pending bill, with few exceptions.

Mr. President, is there anybody here who thinks for one moment that we are going to be able to pass the bill appropriating $2,000,000,000 for public works and have it signed by the President of the United States? If we do pass a $2,000,000,000 appropriation bill for public works, how many of this 8,000,000 or 10,000,000 people who are out of employment do Senators think would be afforded jobs?

Is there anybody in the Senate who is so simple-minded that he believes that the President of the United States would sign a $5,000,000,000 appropriation bill to put men to work? Not at all. Of course he would not. He is going to say, "If you pass a $2,000,000,000 appropriation bill for the purpose of erecting public buildings, you are going to drain the Treasury of the United States; you are going to place a further burden upon the taxpayers; you are going to drive the country off the gold standard." That is what he is going to say, and he is going to veto the bill. There is nobody on this side of the Chamber, or on the other side, in my humble judgment, but who knows and realizes that that is what the President would do and that that is what he woud say.

I have sat here waiting month after month and week after week and day after day in vain for the great engineer at the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue to come forward with some proposal for taking care not only of these ex-soldiers, not only of these veterans, but of the other thousands and millions of men and women of this country who are anxious and willing and want to work, but nothing has been done, and nothing will be done.

Mr. President, I am amazed to hear my good friend the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD] say upon the floor of the Senate that if this bill passes and this money is issued in accordance with the proposals in this bill the soldiers' certificates will depreciate 50 per cent. I did not suppose there was anybody in this body who had the temerity to stand up and say that anything of that kind could occur if $2,000,000,000 of currency should be issued.

I did not suppose that anybody would say that if $2,000,000,000 more money were put into circulation, it would ruin the Government of the United States of America. According to some financiers, and according to some financial papers, if this bill passes, it will drive us off the gold standard. Suppose it did. Assuming, for the sake of the argument, that it would drive us off the gold standard. Just remember that 90 per cent of the countries of the world to-day are off the gold standard. Mr. Brisbane said the other day, with reference to England, that when England went off the gold standard gold began to pour into Great Britain and her commerce and her business and her industry began to pick up and have continued to pick up and are in much better shape than before she went off the gold standard.

The Senator from West Virginia said a few moments ago that the value of gold is based upon the cost of production, and he spoke of the intrinsic value. Gold is worth what it is because of the fact that we passed a law saying that so many ounces of gold are worth so much money in the United States of America. That is the reason. We could say that so much silver is worth so much money, and it would be worth that much money, in my humble judgment, just the same as we could say it of gold.

This bill will do one thing. I do not agree that it will inflate or begin to inflate what those who are opposed to it think it will inflate. I do not think it will begin to cheapen the dollar as much as they predict or as much as one-half of what some have predicted with reference to the bill. But it will put something like $2,000,000,000 in circulation. It will put men to work. It is the only piece of legislation upon which the Senate can vote which has passed the other branch of Congress and which will put as many men to work. It will put them to work because when they get this money they will spend it. They may spend some of it for automobiles, but they will spend most of it for groceries and for the necessities of life. But whatever they spend it for they are going to spend it so that it will go into the channels of commerce and it will give employment to other men who are walking the streets to-night. When we are talking about relieving all classes of people of the Nation, I say this will not only give relief to the veterans but it will likewise give relief to others. If we believe the proponents of the bill, it will give a tremendous lot of relief to the rest of the unemployed in the country, to the farmers in the country, and to every class of our citizenship. No one can deny that.

Mr. President, I dare say there is not a real economist or forward-looking financier who has studied the situation at all who will not say that the one essential thing necessary to do is to get the prices of commodities up if we want to bring back prosperity. There is not a thinking, forward-looking economist in the country but will say that the way to bring back prosperity is by getting money into circulation. I appreciate that there are a few selfish self-centered individuals who are thinking only of the dollars they have invested or of the dollars that they have loaned out. They do not want to see any kind of inflation. They want to suck the last drop of blood out of the American people. They are so selfish and so self-centered that they are willing to take the chance of our whole financial, economic, and moral structure breaking down in chaos in order that they perhaps might make a few more dollars.

This is the one opportunity, Mr. President, that we have for putting money into circulation. It is the one opportunity we have to start the wheels of industry, the one opportunity for raising the prices of the commodities. Senators can stand on the floor of the Senate and say they are not going to vote for the bill because of their love for the veterans and their widows and their orphans. They can say they are not going to vote for the bill because of the fact that they think it is their patriotic duty not to do so. But if they have patriotism in their hearts at all, then the thing they ought to do is to put the debtor class of this country into a position where they can pay off the indebtedness which they have incurred. If we do not do that, and if the present situation continues, then the indebtedness will have to be wiped out, because no farmer can pay off his indebtedness to-day, no farmer can pay the interest upon his indebtedness, and no farmer can pay the taxes with commodity price levels as they are to-day.

I do not care which horn of the dilemma may be taken. Senators can not contradict the proposition that the bill will put $2,000,000,000 in circulation, and that by putting $2,000,000,000 in circulation we will put men to work, we will bring up the price of commodities, and we will help the general economic situation, in my humble judgment, more than by any other means that has been presented to the Congress thus far, unless Senators may want to adopt a system of just issuing more currency. I do not like the idea of turning the printing presses loose. I have pleaded upon the floor of the Senate that the Congress of the United States should adopt bimetallism, but we can not get such a measure through this session of Congress. I did it because of the fact that I want to cheapen the dollar, to put it back, to put it in the same place where it was in 1927. I warned that if that was not done we would be resorting to the printing presses.

This morning, in talking with a man whom I believe to be and who is generally considered to be a great financier and a great industrialist, he said, "There is nothing so very bad about the bonus bill. It is not half as bad as a great many people believe." He said, "It will have a tendency to inflate, but that is what the country needs. It will have a tendency to bring up commodity prices. The only bad thing about it is that other groups of people and other individuals may come down and say 'turn the printing presses loose for us.'" That is the only excuse that can be given for not voting for the bill. But I assume that those who vote for the bill would have the courage to stand up and vote against turning the printing presses loose in general.

I shall vote for the bill, Mr. President, not because these men have come to Congress. I know men have said to me that they are not going to vote for it because they want to show their courage, they want to show their statesmanship, by saying that they defy the ex-soldier. It does not take much courage to do that. It does not take much statesmanship to do that. It does not take much bravery to do that. That is a simple thing to do. But it does take some courage to vote for legislation in this body which is opposed by the great financiers of the country. It does take some courage upon the part of Members of the House and of the Senate to defy the group of individuals who control the money and the credit of the country. There is not a thinking man upon the floor of the Senate who does not in his heart know that it takes courage to defy those who guide the economic and generally the political destinies of this great country of ours.

The other night, when I sought to reduce the appropriation in the Army bill, it was stated by the present occupant of the chair, the President pro tempore [Mr. MOSES], that what I wanted to do was to take money from the Army, from those to whom it belonged, and give it to those to whom it does not belong. Perhaps those who are serving in the Army now are more entitled to money and to a decent living than those who went across the sea and bared their breasts in order to save our country. It may be that a man can claim to be brave when he stands on the floor of the Senate and points to the occupants of the galleries and says he is not going to pay them any money. When I hear this statement made I am reminded of the story of the mouse who was being chased by the cat. The mouse ran down into the cellar and found some liquor spilled upon the floor and began to lap it up. In a moment it turned and ran back upstairs and said, "I want to see that cat."

Mr. President, I am not doing this because of the fact that I want to incur the favor of the ex-soldiers, because, as I said, I do not think those who are suffering to-night are entitled to any more credit than the rest of the men and women of the country who are out of employment and walking the streets. I am doing it because paying them the money will not only help them but will help all the rest of the unemployed of the United States of America to-day. I am voting for the bill because no hope is being held out in this session of the Congress of the United States, and no constructive measure has been adopted or will be adopted to take care of the unemployed. I am voting for it because when the great Republican Party met in Chicago it said to the great mass of working people of the country, as it said to the farmers of the country and as it said to the little business men of the country, "You can leave all hope behind. You can go back to your little farms, you can go back to your dugouts along the roadside, you can tramp up and down the highways and byways, if you please, and have patience and work out your own problems. You can leave all hope behind."

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a copy of a letter written by me on April 23, 1932, with reference to the bonus legislation, and a copy of a telegram sent by me on June 17, 1932, with reference to the same subject.

There being no objection, the letter and telegram were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

APRIL 23, 1932.

Judge R. C. GARLAND,
Wilburton, Okla.

MY DEAR JUDGE: I am pleased to acknowledge your favor inclosing an article from the Oklahoma Legionnaire entitled "Is Senator GORE for Veterans?" You may feel sure that your letter was received in the kindly spirit which inspired it. I am sure that you will receive this answer in the same kindly spirit.

I am grateful to you and my other ex-service friends for your faithful and effective support in the recent campaign. I could name a number of such friends who, like yourself, supported me "without the shadow of turning," and whom I would walk to Oklahoma to serve. This support is appreciated the more because it was voluntary.

I have received several letters inquiring whether I would support the widows and orphans' pension bill and the bill to pay the balance of the adjusted compensation. I have uniformly answered that when those measures passed the House, when the Senate hearings are held and all the facts and phases of the subject have been presented, I would give the matter the most thorough and earnest consideration. I have always added that I would naturally be pleased to find myself in a situation to support the ex-service men's legislative program. Being a judge, you can appreciate my position. If a lawyer should file a case in your court to-day and should ask how you intended to decide the case when it is argued next month, he could hardly regard it as a proof of prejudice if you should reserve your decision until after the law and the facts had been presented. It was a proverb in ancient Greece that "a judge who decided a case right without hearing both sides was an unjust judge." Of course, no man with any mental integrity would decide a question until he had considered it.

As you know, all this bonus legislation was passed while I was out of the Senate, and I am just now familiarizing myself with it. I need hardly repeat that I would be pleased to find myself in a position to support the legislative program of the ex-service men. Like other public men, I desire to have their good will and support. No sane man in public life would willingly, much less willfully, alienate or offend so large and respectable a body of his fellow citizens.

As you suggest, I have suffered a good deal at the hands of some of the ex-service men; but the fact that some of the legionnaires have waged war against me certainly would not justify me in waging war against all the legionnaires. I have no disposition to commit suicide like the Chinese nor commit hara-kiri like the Japanese merely to spite or even to avenge myself upon a few enemies. You may feel sure that any public man who opposes any demand of the ex-service man will do so as a matter of conviction and not as a matter of expediency. It will at least prove his sincerity, though it may impeach his prudence.

I suppose that any good politician would promise in advance to support all legionnaire measures. If I had been a good politician, I would never have lost my seat in the Senate. I voted for the Kenyon amendment to double the soldiers' pay; I voted for every dollar that was needed or asked to wage and win the war. I not only voted to appropriate the money, I voted to raise the money. When it came to economizing between money and blood I preferred to spend money and save blood. I hasten to add here that I have never been able to appraise the service and the devotion of a soldier in terms of dollars and cents; such devotion is beyond money and beyond price. I have always felt that it was an insult to a true soldier to assume that his support could be secured by an appeal to mere monetary or mercenary considerations. For the soldiers who faced death on the field of battle I have an unmeasured admiration.

It is true that I was opposed to the war and voted against the draft, but I have never quarreled with those who favored them. It was the most tragic decision that any of us were ever called upon to make.

I opposed the war, among other reasons, because I could foresee its disastrous consequences. I could foresee our present frightful distress. I knew it would enslave our people with debts and taxes. I said at the time that it would "lay burdens upon the bended backs of our people too grievous to be borne." I sought in vain to avert it.

The war has ruined the world. All economists now agree that our present plight is due to the war. It cost the warring nations $337,000,000,000. It has already cost us fifty billions; it will cost us one hundred billions more. Oklahoma's shares will be three billions—twice the present value of all the property in the State. Of course Oklahoma must pay her share. Her people, her other Senator, and all her Representatives favored the war. Those who favored and those who did not favor the war must pay those who fought the war.

All our governments—local, State, and National—are now costing us $46,000,000 a day. Oklahoma's share is nearly one million a day. Our war debt is now costing us $3,000,000 a day. Our pension roll is now costing us $3,000,000 a day. Every time the sun rises and sets the taxpayers of this country cash in $2,000,000 to pay pensions to the World War veterans alone. That equals the total cost of the Federal Government prior to the war. But our boys fought and bled and died in France; they paid the blood price, the people must now pay the money price. They are paying. More than 880,000 World War veterans are now on the pension roll. More than 382,000 of these had no service disability whatever. Even so, the taxpayer may yet have to appeal to the veterans rather than the politicians for mercy. You will share my regret that it becomes necessary now to tax our overburdened taxpayers to balance the Budget.

The article in the Legionnaire which you inclosed wound up with these two sentences: "However, we demand of both Republicans and Democrats alike that the disabled veterans' legislation should be given their consideration. Write Mr. Gore and see what his answer to you will be." It is not necessary for anyone to write me concerning my attitude toward legislation for our disabled soldiers. I made my attitude plain during the campaign. No man has a deeper sympathy for the disabled soldiers than I have; no man is more determined to see that this Government treats them with justice reinforced with generosity. The man who was disabled in the service of his country; the man who stopped a bullet; that received a wound; that suffered an injury; that lost his health; the man whose earning capacity was impaired on account of his military service has a claim upon his country and his countrymen that I would be the last to repudiate. I know how to sympathize with the disabled. Those who run life's race with a handicap challenge my sympathy. Not only that, I would protect the widows and orphans of the men whose earning capacity was thus impaired. This is a debt which the people must pay. We can not help the dead, but we can help those who are broken in body, broken in health, and who must live their lives as mutilated images of their Maker.

But the widows and orphans' pension bill about which you ask goes much further than that. Several legionnaires have written urging me to support it. They may or may not know that it pensions the millionairess as well as the washerwoman. That bill pensions the widow of a millionaire who never saw France as well as the widow of the soldier who is still sleeping in France. That bill would compel our farmers in Oklahoma to pay taxes with 5-cent cotton and 3-cent cattle to pension heiresses who dwell in marble halls and are arrayed like Solomon in his glory. Should we vote to tax the impoverished farmers of Latimer County in order to pension "the favorites of fate in fortune's lap caressed"? Would you have me vote to tax want to pension wealth; to tax squalor to pension splendor; to tax misery to pension magnificence? But the bill will pass if the soldiers insist, although it was 25 years after the Civil War and 20 years after the Spanish war before the widows' pension legislation was enacted. This bill will add $70,000,000 a year to our pension roll.

As to the paying of the balance of the adjusted certificates now. If we could consult our wishes alone, that would be an undivided pleasure. If we should consult our political interest alone, there could be but one answer to that distressing question. If the money was available, if the money was in sight, all other considerations would yield to gratitude and the claims would be paid now, notwithstanding they are not due until 1945. There is one strong argument in favor of immediate payment. It would secure a wide distribution of the money and would provide many who are need with immediate purchasing power. One reason for voting against the La Follette-Costigan bill to give away $750,000,000 was the fact that its passage would have rendered doubly difficult if not utterly impossible any proposal for the early payment of the bonus. I felt that if we were to borrow that amount it would be better to use it to pay claims than to give alms, however urgent the need.

How can the money be raised; that is the practical, that is the perplexing problem. The boys demand payment now; payment in full; payment in cash. That would take two and a half billion dollars—two and a half billion dollars out of an empty Treasury. The Treasury is worse than empty; we are now wrestling with a deficit of more than two and a half billion dollars. Our Federal Government is now costing us $13,000,000 a day, and we are running behind $7,000,000 a day. The deficit and bonus taken together would require the raising of $5,000,000,000.

How can we raise that amount and balance the Budget? There's the rub. The Budget must be balanced. I know that true soldiers will insist that the Budget be balanced. If it is not, the distressing evils of the present hour may be looked back upon in the future and remembered as the good old days. If the Budget is not balanced the present price of commodities, already below the cost of production, may be hammered down still lower; that would aggravate the distress not only of our farmers but of all other citizens and our soldiers as well. That is the prospect which distresses me most. If we can balance the Budget and raise the money without unbalancing the Budget I shall rejoice to pay this claim. If we can, then so far as I am concerned the ayes have it. We issued bonds to wage the war, and I should be willing to issue bonds to pay this claim growing out of the war. I am not yet certain that this can be done.

I have delayed answering your letter from day to day in order to take soundings among the Senators upon this subject. I know that you and other soldiers will be interested to learn their point of view, and to provide me with arguments in response to theirs.

To my surprise I find that with some Senators the main argument is the fact the Legion convention at Detroit declared against the present payment of the adjusted certificates, and General Pershing, as well as President Hoover, commander-in-chief of the Army, are both opposed to their present payment. Personally I make no point of that.

Some Senators make the point that section 201 of the World War adjusted compensation act provides that: "The amount of adjusted-service credit shall be computed by allowing the following sums for each day of active service in excess of 60 days * * * as shown by the service or other record of the veteran: $1.25 for each day of oversea service, and $1 for each day of home service; but the amount of the credit of a veteran who performed no oversea service shall not exceed $500, and the amount of the credit of a veteran who performed any oversea service shall not exceed $625." And that 25 per cent was added in all cases to the amount of such credits. They contend that those who took advantage of the act passed last year received advances in excess of the total credit and allowance fixed by the law itself and that for the Government now to pay the remaining half would be the payment of interest to accrue between now and 1945 on the advances which have already been made under the act of last year. They say that it is as if the holder of a 20-year life insurance policy maturing in 1945 should bring suit demanding payment of the face value now. Personally, I make no point of this. Given the money I would willingly pay the claim as if it were due now. These Senators seem to attach no weight to the fact that all the members of a given post vote unanimously in favor of paying themselves the bonus now. They say that is voting to take the money out of the pocket of the taxpayers to put it in their own pockets to pay an obligation that is not due for 13 years, when the Government is falling behind with its obligations to the amount of $7,000,000 a day. They say it is like submitting a lawsuit to a jury of 12 men all of whom have a common and direct monetary interest in the verdict. I make no point of that.

The one point that does concern me is this: If we can balance the Budget and raise the money without unbalancing the Budget I shall rejoice to pay this claim. Can the money be raised? The House had, and the Senate is now having, extreme trouble in raising one and a quarter billion dollars in an effort to meet one-half of the deficit by taxation. Every proposal to increase taxes or to reduce expenditures is stubbornly resisted. The plan is to meet the other half of the deficit by issuing bonds. No one has even suggested that we issue paper money to balance the Budget.

To pay the adjusted certificates now will require two and a half billions in cash. Of course, that much cash can not be raised by any form of taxation; that is out of the question.

Can we raise two and a half billion dollars by the sale of bonds and at the same time balance the Budget? If we can, then so far as I am concerned the ayes have it. We issued bonds to wage the war, and I should be willing to issue bonds to pay this claim growing out of the war. I am not yet certain that this can be done. For that reason it has been impossible up to this time for me to return a definite answer as to the payment of the bonus now. As you see, a final, a responsible answer to that question is contingent upon a future event which is as yet in the womb of time.

The suggestion has been made in the House that the bonus be paid not with bonds but with Treasury notes. What is a bond? It is the Government's "promise to pay" in the future. What is a Treasury note? It is the Government's "promise to pay" on demand. Suppose we issue two and a half billion of Treasury notes; both capital and gold would take flight from this country. How would people obtain gold to ship out of the country? They would gather up these Treasury notes by the millions and hundreds of millions, present them to the Treasury Department, and demand immediate payment in gold; the Treasury would have to pay them on demand or else confess insolvency and bankruptcy. The Treasury notes being reissued could be presented again and again for payment in gold; the Government would have to sell bonds to get the gold to pay these Treasury notes in gold. This is exactly what happened in the early nineties. That was the endless chain, the vicious circle which precipitated the panic of 1893 and aggravated the evils of that protracted depression. Such an issue of paper money would drive gold out of the country whether it drove us off the gold standard or not, and every dollar of gold driven out would shrink the basis of potential credit at least $10; that would mean deflation instead of inflation.

Neither a government nor an individual can continue to pay debts with debts—to pay promises to pay with promises to pay. In the long run debts must be paid with taxes and with taxes alone. Such an issue of Treasury notes would intensify the evils of this hour. Germany's disastrous experience with the mark is a red signal that should warn us against a like disaster. England went off the gold standard that reduced the value of the pound one-fourth. That lightened her debts, but her debts are not payable in gold. Our Government bonds, corporation bonds, and many farm mortgages are payable in gold.

If we should go off the gold standard and gold should go to a premium of 25 per cent, as in England, it would simply add 25 per cent to the burden of our gold obligations already unbearable. We can not afford in these distressed times to repeat an experiment which has so many failures and so much of disaster to its credit or discredit. It may be less important that such a result would reduce the value of every savings account, every life-insurance policy, and every share of building and loan stock in the country. It should be borne in mind that if the issue of paper money should result in the inflation of prices, this would be largely limited to retail prices and the prices of articles enjoying a protective tariff. The price of farm products which sell in an unprotected world market would not be correspondingly increased. The farmers' purchasing power might be diminished and his burdens more galling. I shall not quarrel with those who believe in fiat money any more than I would quarrel with those who believe in the fairies. I do not believe in either one; and while under certain circumstances I might vote to issue bonds to pay the bonus, I could not under any circumstances vote to issue paper money for that purpose. The gold standard itself is variable enough and has evils enough of its own to answer for. I am sure you would be the last to ask that I pursue a course which would deepen our present distress and defer our ultimate recovery.

We are passing through one of the most serious crises in our country's history. The destiny of the institutions for which you and your comrades fought may be trembling in the balance. Neither you nor I can afford to augment the danger or add to the misery of our distressed countrymen. I have been trying to find ways and means to change the conditions and to counteract the causes which have brought our calamities upon us. The night is dark, the fog is dense, the lights are dim, the future is still in doubt.

You may feel sure that I will welcome any light from any quarter that will help us to guide the ship of state into a port of safety. I know that you and your comrades who were under fire in France would have been the last to dictate to General Pershing and his staff what course they should pursue when the battle was raging. I am sure you will agree with me that the passengers and crew of a ship in distress ought to allow some little discretion to those who are charged with the tragic responsibility of steering the ship through the storm. As you know, a Senator is a servant of all the people and is not quite free to vacate his responsibility.

The situation in which we find our country and our countrymen to-day is as if you or I should find our residence in flames and our family entrapped in the blazing building. It might be possible for the firemen with courage and energy to extinguish the flames and rescue our family, but no burning building was ever saved when the firemen fled from the fire.

I am one of those who believe that everybody knows more than anybody, and I hope that you and the ex-service men in general will not only feel free but will feel bound to favor me from time to time with any suggestions which might help to solve our problems—to revive the prosperity and to insure the destiny of our country and our countrymen, including citizens and soldiers alike. I shall try to keep an open mind in order to avail myself of the benefits of such suggestions.

With assurances of the highest personal esteem and best wishes, I am,

Your very truly,

T. P. GORE.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 17, 1932.

Mr. HOMER B. PECK,

Vice Commander, Veterans of Foreign Wars, Enid, Okla.:

This will acknowledge telegram requesting me to reverse position and vote for the immediate payment in full of the adjusted-compensation certificates by issuance of new currency. I am anxious to do everything that I can to please and serve our soldier boys, but, as you know, it would take $2,400,000,000 in cash to pay the full face value of the adjusted certificates. I voted yesterday and will vote to-day to pay the full cash value or the full surrender value of the adjusted certificates. That would take about $750,000,000, but the boys should have a right to ask that, and the Government has no controlling reason to refuse such a request even though the certificates are not due under their own terms until 1945; but it would take $1,600,000,000 more to pay the face value of the certificates now. That amount represents interest and other payments which are to accrue during the next 13 years and will not mature until 1945. Is it not the same as if the holder of life insurance who took out a 20-year pay policy maturing in 1945 should demand payment in full now instead of at maturity? Our people can not pay their debts and taxes that are already due, that are past due. We stand face to face with this question should we compel our taxpayers now to pay $2,400,000,000 that will not mature and that will not accrue until 1945. If you were in the Senate, I wonder if you would vote to make your countrymen, to make your distressed friends and neighbors, pay two and a half billions now that are not due till 1945? It should be remembered that our Government has already paid the World War veterans in allowances, compensation, insurance, and otherwise more than $5,500,000,000. The Government is already caring for our disabled veterans. Three hundred and twenty-seven thousand veterans are now on the pay roll whose disabilities resulted from their military service. Three hundred and eighty-two thousand veterans are now on the pay roll whose disabilities have no connection with their military service.

To pay the adjusted-service certificates in full now would go in part to the disabled soldiers who are already taken care of and in part to those who are not disabled, but if we had the money, or if we could raise the money without deepening our distress, I would consent to disregard both the letter and the spirit of the adjustment between the soldiers and the Government and vote to pay them now, even though they are not due until 1945. Last year we had a deficit in the National Treasury of $903,000,000; last year we paid our soldiers one billion one hundred million. This year we have a deficit of more than two and a half billions. We have met that with borrowed money. We have been facing a deficit next year of two and a half billions. We have been taxing everything and everybody to meet that deficit and balance the Budget; we have taxed everything from farmers' gasoline to the candy of little children. We can not raise the money to pay the bonus by any sort of taxation. The Treasury experts and financial authorities practically all agree that to pay the bonus with paper money would aggravate and would protract the evils of this unspeakable depression. I wish to shorten, not to protract, this panic. You can not imagine how much distress it gives me to return this sort of answer. I believe that if the leaders of the different veterans' organizations had gotten together with their friends a practical program could have been worked out that would not have ended in total defeat. This bill has never had a chance to escape or survive the President's veto. Of course everybody knows that and has known it all the time. As much as I dislike to issue bonds and increase debts, I would vote to issue bonds and pay the boys whenever that can be done without unbalancing the Budget and without multiplying and aggravating the evils of this depression. I am afraid that to issue either bonds or paper money at this time to pay a claim that is not due for 13 years would injure every class of our citizens, including the soldiers themselves, as well as our farmers and laborers. I am sure that no soldier who fought to defend his country in time of war would vote to injure his country in time of peace.

THOMAS P. GORE,
United States Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I would like to inquire of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], in order that the record of the proceedings may be complete, whether or not he has offered for printing in the RECORD the adverse report of the Finance Committee upon the pending measure?

Mr. SMOOT. It has been printed as a Senate document.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I would like to have it printed in the RECORD in order that it may be made a part of the proceedings of this day.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, the senior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], my colleague the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. COOLIDGE], and myself have signed a statement which we gave to the press yesterday, setting forth our views in opposition to this legislation. I ask that the statement may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The statement is as follows:

We have supported and will continue to support all measures for the compensation and relief of disabled soldiers. We always urged and voted for a cash payment or bonus instead of the adjusted-compensation certificates. We believed this to be the fairest way of meeting the inadequacy of the Government's compensation to its soldiers during the World War.

The proposition as it is presented to us, however, is not to pay the veterans the cash surrender value that may be due. We favor that. It is a proposal to pay the veterans $2,400,000,000, including 12 years' interest not yet due for certificates not payable until 1945. It is also a request that the taxpayers of the country advance the interest on these certificates that may be earned during the next 12 years. This represents an absolute gift of $1,635,000,000, which is the exact amount over and above the present value of the certificates.

If the country were prosperous and free from the danger of an economic breakdown, we could defend this vast expenditure in view of the distressed condition of many veterans. But, unfortunately, the veterans are not the only unemployed sufferers; millions of other Americans are in the same sad plight. But even this situation would ordinarily justify preference to the veterans.

However, a much more important obstacle prevents our approval—an obstacle that can not be waved aside without most serious consequences to the whole country. The condition of the Public Treasury and the serious menace to the credit of our Nation make it impossible to act favorably on this measure without bringing financial ruin to the country. To take this action now would, in our opinion, produce financial chaos.

Our opportunities to study this problem give us an understanding of what may happen to individual credit, to bank accounts no matter how small, to home mortgages, to insurance companies, and other savings institutions. It means prolonging and intensifying unemployment and an increase in suffering for those who pray for the reopening of shop and factory and a restoration of building and trade. We sincerely believe the relief of the veterans would be offset a hundred times by the increase in hunger and suffering throughout the land.

The Federal Treasury is the last hope of a distressed people. Upon this we must depend if all else fails. It may prove our only hope to save the people from starvation. If the Nation's credit is further contracted, as is certain to be the effect of this proposal, the depression may continue indefinitely, with even the danger of our institutions, financial and political, being irreparably impaired.

That we shall need an unimpaired Treasury next winter no one can question. We propose that when the call comes for that last-ditch aid the Federal Treasury shall not fail the hungry, the suffering, and the destitute.

Against all the dictates of our personal desire, and after long and most serious consideration, we have concluded we would be unfaithful to our public trust and our obligation to all the people if we were to support the pending bonus measure.

DAVID I. WALSH, Massachusetts.
MARCUS A. COOLIDGE, Massachusetts.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask to have read a petition sent to me, signed by an overwhelming majority of the business people of Birmingham, Ala., in connection with the passage of this bill. I do not care to make any remarks or detain the Senate at this late hour, because I think we can vote very shortly upon the bill. But I do desire to have the statement read, and read in such a way that the Senate can see the petition itself. I do not desire to have all the signatures read. I simply desire to have it read in such a way that it may be seen by Members of the Senate. I should like to have the clerk turn so that the petition may be seen.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

BIRMINGHAM, ALA., May 23, 1932.

Hon. HUGO L. BLACK,
The Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The undersigned business firms of Birmingham herewith recommend that immediate full cash payment of veterans' adjusted-service certificates be authorized by Congress and firmly believe that this money put in circulation at this time will benefit the entire Nation and be a powerful stimulant in lifting our country out of the throes of the present economic crisis.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, for several years the Congress has had before it the problem of paying the bonus; in fact, it has become, as the Bible says about the poor, something that is always with us. When the issue first was presented to the Congress some years ago I came to the conclusion that the Government owed the ex-service men a certain amount of money that had not been paid them during the World War, that that money should be paid, and I have voted for every proposal that has been made to pay the bonus in full. The President vetoed the bill, and the Congress overrode that veto.

The hard times of the last three years, however, have brought a most insistent demand from the ex-service men, from their friends, and from those who believe in the justice of their claim, that Congress should pay this money at once. So in the last Congress we voted not to pay them, but to loan them 50 per cent of the face of their certificates on a basis of interest charges which, if continued, will eat up the balance of the bonus for all these boys. We now have before us the proposal to cancel the interest and to pay the balance of the face of these bonus certificates at once to these men.

I may be wrong in my conclusions regarding the effect of this proposed legislation, if it should be passed; naturally Senators differ, just as economists and authorities on the monetary systems of the world differ; but I can not bring myself to believe that we can print $2,400,000,000 of paper money with nothing behind it and pass it out among our people without wrecking the monetary system of the country.

I recognize that there is to-day a certain amount of paper money that has no security behind it other than the promise of the Government to pay, but that amount is limited; and in view of the securities which are held to sustain that money and the gold reserve, I believe there is to-day more than 100 cents on the dollar behind every piece of money that exists in the United States.

There are about $5,000,000,000 outstanding, we are told. Now it is proposed to issue two and one-half billion dollars more without any security whatever and to pass it out to the veterans. I can not bring myself to believe that such money, if issued, would be anything but fiat money, and that its issuance would bring upon the country an inflation that would make it impossible for anybody to know from one day to another the value of the money of the United States.

I for one refuse to be led into voting for what I think is a proposal which will result in destroying the monetary system of this country under the guise of paying a bonus. Every one of us from childhood has had burned into our brains the old saying, "It is not worth a continental." What do the words mean? Knowledge of the worthlessness of the continental paper money has come down from Revolutionary days, until we say of anything which is of doubtful value that "It is not worth a continental."

Following the Civil War period there were those who said that if we issued greenbacks with the guaranty of the Government behind them money in that form would be sound, but again their predictions were wrong, and the greenbacks were not worth 100 cents on the dollar; they varied up and down in value according to the thought and faith of the people.

So, Mr. President, much as I am in favor of paying the veterans of the World War what I think they are entitled to have, much as I believe it is the duty of this Government to pay that debt and pay it now, I can not and I will not stultify myself by voting for the issuance of two and a half billion dollars of fiat money which, in my judgment, will be a fraud upon the veterans, because the money they receive will depreciate in their own fingers before they can spend it, even if they should spend it within a week of the time they get it and it should be issued right away. It will be a wrong to the American people, who, having so little money as they now have, after the issuance of this great amount of paper money will not know the value of our money.

So, for one, much as I desire to see this bonus paid—and I believe it should be paid—I can not vote for this legislation, and thereby do what I think would be an irreparable wrong to the American people.

If there is any one thing that the Congress ought to do in these days, it seems to me, it is to maintain the soundness of American money. I know there have been periods in our history when there was a tremendous amount of currency outstanding with nothing behind it but the guaranty of the Government; but I remind the Senate that those were periods when the people had faith in the financial institutions of the country, when they had faith in the business institutions of the country, when they had faith in the Government of the country. That, however, is not the condition to-day; the American people have lost faith in the great financial institutions of this country; they have lost faith in the banks; they have lost faith in industrial bonds and securities; they have almost lost faith in the Government itself; and in a time like this I can not bring myself so to stultify myself as to vote to put upon the American people two and a half billion dollars of cheap paper money.

But, Mr. President, simply because I am unwilling to do that is no reason why I should not be willing to propose a plan and stand behind a plan to give the veterans what they are entitled to have in money that is sound, in money that will be worth 100 cents on the dollar; and I want to offer for the consideration of the Senate an amendment that will make it possible to pay the surrender value of these certificates at the present time at 2 per cent discount, and pay it in cash, by selling bonds to the people of the country, putting the money thus obtained in the Treasury and paying it to these men. That is an honest proposition; that is a decent proposition; that is a proposition that Senators can vote for and look the veterans in the face and look their fellow citizens in the face and know that they have kept their oaths of office by supporting the Constitution of the United States and that they have tried to serve the interests of the people of the United States.

Mr. President, this bill has reached a parliamentary status in the Senate which is known as the third reading. I want to offer an amendment, but I am told that the amendment is out of order. The fact of the matter is that no amendments have been offered to this bill. The reason for it is that the Senate was engaged in a general discussion of the bill; Senators were not on the floor, and had no idea that we were coming to a vote. The Vice President, or whoever was in the chair at the time, said the question was on the third reading of the bill; the bill was read the third time, and the yeas and nays were ordered on its passage. Consequently we were shut off from offering amendments, and I submit that under these conditions I ought to have the right, by unanimous consent, to offer an amendment whereby those of us who want to vote for an honest bonus measure may have a chance to do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. May the Chair say to the Senator from Washington that that right exists under the rules? Amendments may now be offered by unanimous consent.

Mr. DILL. I understand that, and I am going to ask such unanimous consent in just a moment, but I want to make the situation clear. I am willing, if unanimous consent shall be granted, along with it to ask for a limitation on debate not to exceed five minutes on the part of any Senator. I want to appeal to Senators to be fair in this matter. It is a common custom in the Senate when a bill of great importance, such as this, is before us that Senators do not stay here all the time. The Senator in charge of the bill generally stays here all the time, and there are oftentimes parliamentary steps taken without Senators being aware of them, just as occurred in this case. I do not think I am asking anything unreasonable or anything unjust when I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment, the debate on it to be limited to five minutes by any Senator; and I now make that request for unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, withholding objection for the time being, I want to call the attention of the Senator from Washington that it is very evident he has overlooked the fact that the Treasury notes which are to be issued under this bill are redeemable the same as are any other Government notes that are outstanding, and there are several types of notes outstanding.

As a matter of fact, to-day there is $1,300,000,000, as I pointed out in the debate this afternoon, without any reserve whatever, without an ounce of gold back of it, all of which maintains its stability only because there are United States Government bonds which serve as the obligation and the promise of the Government of the United States, or by operation of law, are they stabilized.

The bill now before us provides for the issuance and deposit of United States bonds in the sum of $2,400,000,000 with the Federal reserve system. The Federal reserve system has the authority to dispose of those bonds identically in the same way that they have authority now to go out in the open market and sell United States bonds, and with the same effect. The money that will be issued under this bill will be just as sound and just as stable and just as honest as the $1,300,000,000 now in circulation, which I discussed this afternoon.

So the Senator is merely proposing now a new method, the result of which will be identically the same as that proposed by the bill. The only difference between the Senator's proposal and the proposals at present in the bill is this:

Under the Senator's proposal he would issue $2,400,000,000, less a discount of 2 per cent, of United States bonds to be thrown upon the market, which in all probability would crash the market, would depreciate every United States bond now outstanding, would bring a crash upon this country the like of which we have never experienced.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I did not yield to the Senator from Wisconsin for a speech. I shall be glad to answer any questions the Senator may ask.

Mr. BLAINE. If the Senator will permit me to finish my statement——

Mr. DILL. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. BLAINE. It would bring a crash in the financial affairs of this Government. Under the proposals of this bill the $2,400,000,000 will be fed out to the public as the Federal Reserve Board may in its judgment determine, in order to secure the stability not only of the financial affairs of our Government but, as well, the stability of every bond issued by the Federal Government.

So, Mr. President, in view of that situation, I must object to any unanimous-consent agreement to the offering of any amendment at this stage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, the Senator either did not hear me when I spoke, or he did not pay close attention to what I said.

I am fully aware that there are considerable sums of currency outstanding based on United States Government bonds. I so stated. In fact, there is some currency that does not even have bonds back of it. But this proposal is to add $2,400,000,000 on top of that, which in my judgment will destroy the sound value not only of those that will be issued but of those already outstanding.

In the second place, I am not proposing to unload $2,400,000,000 of bonds at all. I am proposing to unload probably about a billion dollars of bonds upon the market, and in that way to obtain money of the United States that has security back of it, and pay it to these men. So that there is a vast difference between the proposal which I am making and the proposal which is in this bill, which the Senator says is the same.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. DILL. I yield for a question, but not for a speech.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to ask the Senator to what extent the billion dollars which he proposes to raise will discharge the $2,400,000,000 of obligations?

Mr. DILL. It will discharge the surrender value of these certificates. I can not see on what theory we should pay to these veterans now the face value under date of 1945. I think they are entitled to the surrender value of these certificates now, and I have made the basis 2½ per cent.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, is my understanding correct that the Senator proposes to discount the adjusted-compensation certificates 2 per cent?

Mr. DILL. Two and a half per cent.

Mr. BLAINE. Does the Senator contend, then, that it will take only a billion dollars to discharge the obligations?

Mr. DILL. I am not sure of the amount, but I have been told that it will take probably about a billion dollars, considering that the men who have not already borrowed probably will not want to surrender their certificates. I am thinking now in terms of the men who have already borrowed one-half of the face of the certificates.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, the explanation is entirely unsatisfactory. It does not meet the situation at all. I think we had better pursue the course outlined in the bill. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington has the floor.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, of course this objection can be made, and we are helpless in the matter, but it does seem to me a very unjust proposition that no amendments can be offered to this bill.

They have the power in the House of Representatives, and exercise it, by rule, to prohibit amendments. Here, a parliamentary situation develops without notice, without opportunity of presentation of amendments, because Senators do not happen to be on the floor during the whole of a long debate, and then all opportunity to offer any amendment is cut off. Of course, that being the case, and some Senator objecting, I am unable to bring about a vote on this amendment.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. DILL. Not for a moment.

However, I do want to avail myself of what I think is my parliamentary right.

I now move to recommit this bill to the committee with instructions to amend the bill, on page 2, line 1, by striking out the word "face," after the word "the," and inserting the word "surrender," and in line 2, after the word "computed," by inserting the words "at the rate of 2½ per cent."

Then, on page 4, in line 15, strike out the word "face" and insert the word "surrender" again, and in line 18 strike out "in Treasury notes" and insert "from the Treasury of the United States." In line 20 strike out the words "issue United States notes" and insert "sell 20-year bonds." Then, in line 21, strike out the rest of section 2 down to section 3.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington moves that the bill be recommitted with certain amendments, which he has stated. [Putting the question.] The noes have it, and the motion is rejected.

Mr. SCHALL obtained the floor.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. SCHALL. I do.

Mr. NEELY. I ask unanimous consent that after the conclusion of the address which the Senator from Minnesota is about to deliver debate shall be limited to five minutes, and that no Senator shall speak more than once until the bill is finally disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I want to suggest that there has been an ignominious silence here this afternoon on the part of those who are opposing this bill for other reasons than have been set forth here this afternoon. I think that we ought to give them an opportunity to discuss this bill.

I therefore must object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made. The Senator from Minnesota has the floor.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, the assumption of virtue by which we have to-day been giving pious and statesmanlike excuses for voting against this bill seems to me only to be equaled by the patience with which the ex-service men are forced to endure them.

Such excuses remind me of the father who, chastising his son, remarked that it hurt him worse than it did the son; and the son replied, "But not in the same place, Dad." [Laughter.]

We are applying our poultices to the wrong place. It is the stomach of the ex-service man that is in pain, it is the heart that is wrung when he has no work with which to earn the necessities for his wife and little ones. Why talk of tweedledee and tweedledum when dire necessity is in the saddle?

They are hungry and out of jobs. They did their work and earned their pittances. Must they wait a generation for the money we owe them?

WALL STREET DIDN'T WAIT

The beneficiaries of the war did not have to wait. They got their billions while the boys were fighting. The financiers got their $3,000,000,000 "reconstruction" dole as soon as they asked us for it. It would have been thoroughly impolite to have caused them any anxiety of waiting. Their newspapers and radio agitators condemned us for even keeping them waiting a few days till we examined their $3,000,000,000 demand. Now these same implements loudly applaud us for the serious and dignified demeanor and uplifted arm of adjectives and statesmanlike words we employ to ward off the soldier boys' demand. Shall the boys who saved the world for democracy and for Wall Street have to wait until 1945?

Is the bill for a currency issue of $2,000,000,000—secured if need be by a bond issue—beyond our financial resources?

Since 1920 our interest-bearing debt has been cut down over $8,000,000,000. A further debt of $2,000,000,000 would not endanger the world's greatest financial power.

Since 1920 our gold reserves have grown by $2,000,000,000. Our Federal reserve notes have been contracted by $1,600,000,000. Both give foundation for new currency. Since 1920 the per capita money circulation has been reduced by $20 per capita.

The country needs the money and is able to finance the issue. We owe the veterans. Why keep them waiting until 1945? Shall we wait until most of them are in their graves? Why issue $3,000,000,000 of credit to finance the financiers and then rebuff the boys who fought to save the financiers' country?

As a Member of the House, I listened 15 years ago, and in 1924, to all the same noble excuses that have been made here this evening and during the day. I heard the same thing then that we have heard here to-day; the excuse that we were going to ruin the Government, we were going to inflate, we were going to do this, and we were going to do that. The only excuse that I have not heard to-day, but which was prevalent in 1924 in the House, is the excuse that the boys would only squander this extra $1.25 in riotous and infamous living.

We owed this bill in 1918. One dollar and twenty-five cents a day extra for getting killed for your country, and then you have to race with life for 20 years in order to collect! Why, there was not a man, woman, or child in this country that you could hire for less than $5 a day.

I was in France in 1918. I was in Paris when the "Big Berthas" were throwing their shells in there. German patrols had been captured within 6 miles of Paris. Consternation was everywhere. Refugees with their kith and kin were getting out of the city.

AMERICAN COURAGE

Our boys started the Chateau-Thierry drive in June, which was America's first real participation and the beginning of the end. They finished the job in six months. No dilly dallying, no loss of time, they cleaned the job up satisfactorily and surely are entitled to $1.25 extra for their overtime, speed, and efficiency.

Foch realizing that Paris was doomed looked for some means by which to deter the steady march on Paris.

The Crown Prince, with the Prussian Guard, at the head of a great army, was moving toward Paris at the rate of 4 or 5 miles a day. They captured Belleau Wood. Their cannons placed, they swept the road for miles ahead. They were confident of going into Paris. So sure were they—and they were not alone in it; the French, the English, the Belgians, the Italians, and the Germans believed it—that they dressed themselves in their dress uniforms, starched bosom shirts and spiked helmets.

It was a gala day, for nothing could deter them from marching into Paris. Foch withdrew his troops for a last desperate stand. He thought of the American boys. He did not believe they could alter the situation, but he did hope that they might badger and detract. Foch had no faith in the undisciplined Americans. They were not trained, and an untrained soldier to him was a zero with the rim rubbed off; but he thought he would use them as a sort of stopgap for the real soldiers, the French, the veterans, the boys that had been fighting, you know, and would not get out of the trenches, who stayed there and called it a stalemate until the Germans charged them and drove them out. These supersoldiers he moved back for the last stand before Paris.

So fierce was the attack of the Americans that the Germans thought there were unlimited reserves. A miracle was performed; the oncoming victorious Germans turned back and the destiny of civilization changed. This kind of soldier boys ought to be proof to any Senate that they were worth over and above the $1 a day they received an extra $1.25, and they ought not to have to wait 20 years to get that, even if there were no question of hunger and want of themselves and their loved ones.

The German retreat brought the French up alongside, but the American contingent pushed its nose out into the enemy faster than the French troops. Foch sent orders to the commanders of the salients again and again that the American troops were going too fast and that they should be held back. Finally, not having his orders obeyed, he called the commander of the salient upon the carpet, and the commander defended himself by saying, "How the h—— do you expect me to hold them back when the whole German Army can't?"

He did not know, but what he needed was real action, and he got it from our boys. He picked up four regiments of them, the Fifth and Sixth Marines, and a couple of other regiments, loaded them onto trucks, and drove them up there in the night, in the rain, and they were unloaded in the mud. As they passed the retreating French they were hailed by "You're zigzag; you're crazy. Sure death ahead. Go back." But these eager, smooth-faced Americans, who had never smelled the smoke of battle, were not made of the stuff that goes back when the enemy is in front. And yet we can not find it in our hearts to give them an extra $1.25 a day for this kind of work. The next morning when the Germans attacked they were met by these four regiments of American boys, about 15,000 in all. Five German divisions. They were stopped and turned back.

The boys did their work well, and victory over the hitherto undefeated Prussian Guard sent an electric current of success down the lines of all the Allies and kindled the morale that was dead back into life. Some of these boys are sitting up there in the gallery. That kind of stuff is worth preserving, it is worth honoring, even to the extent of irritating Wall Street in order that we may keep our word.

WAR DEBTS AND MORATORIUM

We not only owe this money morally but because we have agreed to pay it. I remember when the House voted to give them a $60 bonus. That would not buy them a suit of clothes at that time. Then we dawdled on for years, and finally passed this thing that is here, this graveyard bonus. And now you are refusing to redeem those certificates. The boys are hungry, they are out of work, they need help, they fought your battles. Why don't we vote to pay?

Oh, says somebody, we have not the money. We did not have the money, either, when our noble allies wanted to borrow it from us. What did we do? We went out to the people and got it, just as this bill proposes that we should do here to-night. We sold bonds. The people went down into their socks, and behind the old mantelpiece, and dug up some $12,000,000,000.

A lot of that money, half of it, I think, was loaned after the armistice. I know a billion three hundred million was loaned to France after the war was over.

We paid for transporting every one of our soldiers across the water. We paid from $80, I think, up to $140, for every soldier they took across to fight their battles. We paid cash as we went.

After figuring up what they owed us in the way of money loaned, the money we borrowed from the people to give the Allies, we promised to pay the people back that money with interest at 3½ to 4 to 4½ and 5 per cent, and at the end of 25 years pay back the principal.

England owed us $4,715,000,000. We gave her the principal—big, generous boys, but we will not pay an extra $1.25 to the men who did and would lay down their lives for us. A dollar and a quarter! And we are haggling here about giving it to them. We haggled back there 15 years ago. At the very same time we were lending billions to our noble allies for whom we had to send our boys to Europe to win the war.

They are displeased now. They say we did not come over early enough. If we had waited six months longer—yes, three months—they would not have been calling us "Uncle Shylock" to-day, because the Germans would have been in possession of Paris, and had Paris fallen France would have fallen, for Paris is the heart of France. Munitions, railways, manufactures centered there.

Had France fallen, the English would have soon been pushed back into the channel and the war would have been over, and we would have been good fellows, like the rest of the nations that did not lend them any money and did not fight their battles for them. From the way they talk to-day you would think that we had lost the war. Instead of being grateful for our altruistic entry into this war, they call us "Uncle Shylock." Why? Because they are to pay us a slight little interest on the money we loaned them. The only nations that went into the war without thought of reward were China and the United States. Every other nation, it has oozed into light since, went into the war because they wanted something that somebody else had.

In settlement we asked not a penny of reparations, not a foot of land. Because of this war England now owns nearly a third of the face of the world. In that settlement France filled her pockets, Italy her lap, and Japan her arms. The only tangible thing that we got was prohibition.

England treated us in the settlement the whitest of any. We have agreed to settle, to wipe out the principal of $4,715,000,000. We did not hear anything about the Government going to smash because of that. We did not hear about the inflation proposition that would drive bonds down and something else up. We just settled and gave them that principal, and accepted in lieu thereof a small interest of 3.7 per cent over a period of 62 years.

We loaned France $4,400,000,000. We gave her the principal and accepted a dinky little interest of 2.17 per cent. But still she calls us "Uncle Shylock."

Belgium we loaned half a billion. We accepted interest there of 2.1 per cent.

Over half of the amount Italy owed us was borrowed after the armistice. We loaned her $2,150,000,000, and we gave her the principal and accepted in lieu thereof the minute interest of 1.1 per cent.

We loaned 12 different nations $12,000,000,000, and we are getting an average of less than 2½ per cent interest on this, the principal entirely forgiven. We are paying interest on this $12,000,000,000 we loaned our noble allies, a little less than $800,000,000 a year, so that on interest alone we are losing half a billion dollars a year, and yet we must pay the principal when it comes due. Surely if we can do this for nations who do not appreciate it and slander us for not doing more, we can give to the boys who represented us over there so nobly an extra $1.25 a day.

Let nobody mislead you with this "bunk" that is being peddled constantly from across the water about our settling for a percentage. There is no percentage about it. We gave them the principal and accepted only a dinky little rate of interest. And they want us to cancel that, and we did grant them a moratorium this year for this $250,000,000 at the expense of our own taxpayers.

It seems to me, Senators, that the thing to do here is just to be men, just use common sense. Not be such great statesmen, not be so prolific in the use of words that convey only something we do not mean. Just admit that we owe this to the boys and figure out some way to take care of it. If we have not got the money, let us borrow it. We did that for foreign nations. Why can not we do it for our kith and kin and blood?

UNEMPLOYED

I want the unemployed put to work. I voted for the La Follette-Costigan bill, and will vote for any other bond bill that may be brought up here that would put the men of this Nation to work. Here you have a chance to take care of these boys and some of us are throwing it away in the hopes we are going to get a chance to vote for some other bill in which they may be taken care of. It seems to me a bird in the hand is worth several in the adjacent bush. They went over there and they lost their jobs. Oh, we were going to do wonders for them when they came back, and when they came back they could not get their jobs and somebody else had their girls, their sweethearts, and in some instances even their wives, and yet there are those who fear that it will ruin the country to pay them an extra $1.25 a day, yet we paid every other claim, even the Government employees, or gave a bonus and that bonus cash. Twenty dollars a month added to their wages that has continued up to now. They had jobs. The soldiers had to look for their jobs. We did not compel the employees to wait 20 years to get it. We gave the railroads a bonus; we have bonused everyone except the American soldier.

Mr. President, I had opportunity to observe these boys on the field of battle. I lined with them at mess and communed with them in bivouac in the night, at a time when men's tongues are loosed and they talk. I was on the Mount Vernon when she was torpedoed 250 miles off the coast of Brest, where over 40 of our sailor boys were killed. I talked with two of them while they were dying, literally scalded to death, and I am bursting proud to only belong to the country which raises such stock. The American soldier, sailor, and marine are the bravest in the world. If I had but one word, I should describe them with the word "courage." No nation in all the annals of the past anywhere in history has produced such bravery, such willingness to die. Let us imitate their courage and valor and vote them this bonus despite the repercussion of Wall Street.

ROMAN REPUBLIC

Despite the heroic efforts of Julius Caesar, the Roman Republic fell because her Senate forgot her soldiers. Seventy senators partook in the stabbing of Caesar and the denial of a just reward to her soldiers. Shall we duplicate their action? The invading army of Huns, Norsemen, Mongols marched to victory and Rome burned. Her defenders had become the rabble of the street, no longer interested in the defense of their country. To-day Rome is but a memory, a lesson. The same problem is now before us. What will our answer be to our veterans now tramping the streets in search of work, in quest of food for selves and families? Senators, shall our "no" be the beginning of the end of another great Republic?

I will not take more time of the Senate. We are near a vote and it is late.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I had intended to offer two amendments to the pending bill, but I find that the bill has been advanced to the third reading, that the yeas and nays have been ordered, and that the bill has reached the parliamentary stage where amendments are out of order. I had intended to move an amendment on page 2, line 1, to strike out the word "face" and to insert the word "surrender" so that it would read surrender value, that would have provided an immediate payment of about 750 millions to the veterans. That amendment, however, has just been offered by the Senator from Washington, and has failed in this parliamentary situation.

I had intended to move an amendment on page 5, line 8, to give the bonds authorized in this measure the circulation privilege. The amendment simply embodied provisions of a bill recently reported by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] at the instance of the Committee on Banking and Currency. This would have insured their sale at a fair price and would provide a basis for an increase in our circulation. I should have followed that with an amendment to eliminate the fiat money features of the pending bill.

I ask the Senator from Utah whether he is fixed in his purpose to object to all amendments?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I will have to.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate or delay the vote more than one minute.

I shall not elaborate my views on this measure, because everybody knows that this bill will not become a law. Everybody has known from the beginning that this bill would not be enacted into law. Everybody has known from the beginning that if this measure passed Congress, it would be vetoed by the President of the United States. Everybody knows that it could not escape a presidential veto. Everybody knows that it could not be passed over the veto of the President. That fact has faced us grim as a death's head from the beginning.

This scene enacting here to-night is a mere pantomime. It is a vain show. If any soldier boy has been led to believe that this measure would become the law or that the bonus would be paid now, he has been misled; he has been dazzled by the radiance of the rainbow; he has been pursuing the radiant and the receding splendors of the rainbow; it has been a bow of promise, merely that and nothing more; he has been pursuing a rainbow, and there was not even a fabled pot of gold at the foot of this rainbow.

Mr. President, to me there is something about it all that is pathetic, that is pitiable.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-one Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I do not rise to offer any excuse for my vote upon the bill nor have I any apologies to offer for the vote I shall cast.

When the World War started and the draft law was enacted by Congress, I went on record to the effect that if we were going to draft the young men of the United States to fight our battles we should also draft the wealth of the United States to pay for the war as we went along. That suggestion was held at that time to be almost anarchistic, but if that had been done, we would not be in the financial condition we are in to-day. We would not be called upon to pass a little bonus bill for the boys who fought the war, either.

Mr. President, I have been rather amused at some of the statements that have been made and some of the reasons given as to why certain Senators felt compelled to vote against the measure. Some of them seem to have felt that the issue of $2,400,000,000 of paper money might destroy the financial system. I want to say the financial system at the present time is mighty badly bent. I am not sure that a couple of billion dollars new issue might not help to straighten up the bad situation that exists at the present time.

From the 1st of September, 1929, to the 1st of December, 1931, it is estimated that $90,000,000,000 was lost in stocks and bonds on the market, according to the figures of the New York Stock Exchange. Ninety billion dollars lost in stocks and bonds! The United States Congress sat idly by and let the gamblers fleece the people out of that money and it did not destroy our financial system either. That $90,000,000,000 amounts to $750 for every man, woman, and child in the United States. That is as much as the bonus will amount to for the boys who are asking for the balance of their bonus at the present time. That $90,000,000,000 lost in the stock exchange is eight times the amount of gold in the whole world to-day.

It is about time a lot of us here began to worry over the situation, it seems to me, when millions of men and women are out of employment, when prices of our farm products have gone so low that no one can begin to get cost of production for them. It is time we began to worry. It is about time to lock the barn door after the horse has been stolen.

Mr. President, in my opinion the World War veterans are entitled to more than they were getting even if they were paid in cash at the present time. Since the close of the World War our hospitals and sanitariums and insane asylums have treated more than 100,000 mental patients among the World War veterans. Over 100,000 of those boys have lost their reason. Most of those cases have passed on, but according to the latest figures, on March 31 of this year, 16,918 of those same World War veterans were still in sanitariums and insane asylums with their reason all gone or partially gone because of the effects of the World War.

There are more of them on the verge of insanity, left without any money, without any work, their families going hungry. Here we are about to deny them a little cash bonus to enable them to eke out an existence for a few months at least. Undoubtedly we will have to appropriate money to feed the people of the United States before another year rolls around. If this money due to these soldier boys were paid now it would at least take care of that group for a time or until perhaps we can enact some legislation looking toward a great system of public works that will give employment. These boys would like to have steady employment rather than the cash bonus at this time, but apparently they are not going to get either one.

Mr. President, as I said in the beginning I have no apology to make for the way I am going to vote. I believe 90 per cent of the people of the United States favor the payment of the bonus at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill having been read the third time, the question is, Shall the bill pass? On that question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BARKLEY (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON].

If he were present, I understand he would vote as I intend to vote. Therefore I am at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma (after having voted in the affirmative). Mr. President, I desire to take no chance, and I change my vote from "yea" to "nay," with the idea of entering a motion to reconsider if the opportunity shall present.

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 62, as follows:

YEAS—18

Ashurst	Broussard	Neely	Shipstead
Black	Byrnes	Norbeck	Steiwer

So the bill failed of passage.

Mr. BANKHEAD and Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I have no purpose indefinitely to continue the consideration of this question in view of the tremendous majority that has been cast against the Patman bill. It is my desire, however, if the motion to reconsider shall be agreed to, after it shall have been entered, to present a proposal providing for the payment of the adjusted-service certificates upon a present-value basis with certain alterations in the method of calculation.

The certificates, reduced to their present value, according to the information furnished me by the Veterans' Administration, amount to $768,445,396. There is now included in the appropriate appropriation bill $100,000,000 to be applied to the sinking fund for the ultimate retirement of these certificates, which would leave, if the certificates were reduced to their present value, giving credit for the $100,000,000 included in the appropriation bill, $668,445,396.

The certificates now outstanding, if the attitude of this body continues as it is, will at the date of their maturity have a value of $82 in the case of those upon which 50 per cent has been borrowed. The basis for the calculation upon which the face value of the certificates is computed was $1 a day for those who served in this country and $1.25 for those who had foreign service for the time they were abroad, plus 25 per cent, which is supposed to have been included because of the deferred payment. That has been worked into an insurance policy so as to include the original per diem allowance and the 25 per cent and interest compounded at 4 per cent per annum.

On the loans which have been made on all the certificates except about 900,000, something short of a million, the interest is fixed at 4½ per cent. So it is evident that with 4 per cent interest compounded annually the face of these certificates is eaten up by the 4½ per cent annually compounded.

I may add that in working out the present value the unearned portion of the 25 per cent is included in the estimate of the present value. As a matter of fact it has been seven years the 1st of last January since these certificates were issued. The unearned proportion is thirteen-twentieths of that additional 25 per cent. The allowance based upon the per diem amounted to $400, and to that was added 25 per cent, which ran the amount of the principal at the beginning of the transaction on an average up to $500.

In computing the present value the department uses only seven-twentieths of the 25 per cent, or the $100 which was added to the $400, and in making the computation upon that basis—and I have a letter from the Director of Veterans' Affairs giving the figures—the amount as stated, including the $100,000,000 now appropriated, is $668,445,396.

It seems to me, as a matter of absolute justice and fairness, that the full 25 per cent should be allowed, because it was a part of the principal in the beginning of this settlement. It was as much a part of the principal as the $400 based upon a per diem; so that if a settlement is now made upon the present value of the certificates, I submit that the full 25 per cent should be added to the $400 that was originally granted. If that is done, there is thirteen-twentieths of that $400 still due; and, computing it upon the number of certificates outstanding—3,500,000 in round figures—that would add $227,500,000 to the present value, making a total of $895,000,000, not quite $900,000,000, which would be necessary now, at the election of the holders of the certificates, to settle in full these bonus certificates.

I propose, if reconsideration is granted, to give the option to the holders of these certificates to settle on that basis, or to hold their certificates in the hope, if they entertain it, that some subsequent Congress may deal differently with this problem.

Mr. President, based upon the number of those who have borrowed one-half of their certificates, under this computation, by reducing the interest upon the loans on those certificates from 4½ per cent to 2 per cent, the amount that they could now draw would be $97, while under the present law if they should wait until 1945 they would draw only $82, and in the meantime the cost to the Government would be much greater.

If we take this amount, then it will be necessary to appropriate annually for 15 years only $75,000,000. We are reducing the annual appropriation for the sinking fund in the sum of $25,000,000 a year. So those who think of this matter only from the standpoint of the Treasury of the United States should realize that in the long run the taxpayers and the Treasury will save a large sum of money if we adopt this plan rather than pursuing the present plan and appropriating from time to time a sufficient sinking fund to bring the amount up to $2,400,000,000 in the next 13 years.

Mr. President, I am not concerned about the depreciation of the currency based upon this proposition, which, if all the holders see fit to settle their certificates, amounts to less than $900,000,000. Every Senator upon this floor knows, if he has been reading the papers upon the subject, that there is to-day a larger amount than that absolutely withdrawn from circulation and hoarded.

This amount, if all of the soldiers accept it, will not replace in the channels of circulation and trade the amount that is now actually withdrawn, put into safe-deposit boxes, sent abroad, or otherwise disposed of. I propose to raise this money by having the Government issue 2 per cent bonds and deposit them as security with the Federal reserve banks, and then use the annual appropriation for the sinking fund to retire each year one-thirteenth of the bank notes that will be issued against those bonds.

How can anyone think that such a proposal would depreciate the value of the dollar, when all of the taxing resources of our great country are put behind it, when the Federal reserve system with adequate bonds of the United States is behind it, and when we will make an annual appropriation retiring one-thirteenth of those bank notes every year? Then, too, as I stated, the appropriation that would be necessary to accomplish that purpose is $25,000,000 a year less than would be required under the present plan.

It is perfectly evident that this body does not favor changing the present plan; but here is a proposal to give those who want to avail themselves of it the opportunity to receive the present value of their certificates and at the same time to save money for the Treasury each year and in the aggregate, because while we are now appropriating around $100,000,000 a year it is perfectly apparent to everybody that that will not by 1945 amount to $2,400,000,000, and we must begin to increase the appropriation for the sinking fund.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Chair what is before the Senate at this particular time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am speaking.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is addressed to the Chair, not to the Senator from Alabama. Has the Senator entered his motion?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then there is nothing before the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, Mr. President, I object to——

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah has the floor.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah has the floor at present.

Mr. SMOOT. If there is nothing before the Senate——

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am going to put something before the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will make his motion, all right.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama make a motion?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will make the motion if the Presiding Officer holds that I can not speak without making it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator can not speak without a motion being made. There is nothing before the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. For what purpose does the Senator rise?

Mr. BORAH. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BORAH. I am just as anxious to dispose of this matter as anyone; but do I understand that the rule has been established here that because there is nothing actually pending before the Senate a Senator may not speak?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not if objection is made.

Mr. BORAH. What is the rule that enables the Chair to take a Senator off the floor simply because there is no particular measure pending before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is nothing pending, there is nothing on which to speak.

Mr. BORAH. I beg the Chair's pardon; there is no rule that I know of which permits any such proceeding.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has ruled. The Senator from Alabama can make his motion if he desires.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HARRISON. I understood that the Senator from Alabama rose to make a motion to reconsider the vote by which this bill was defeated.

Mr. SMOOT. But the Senator says he has not made it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi has the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. The inquiry is, Did the Senator make the motion?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion has not been made.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am explaining what I am leading up to.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I call for the regular order; and I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of H. R. 12445, being the bill to relieve destitution, to broaden the lending powers of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and so forth.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. For what purpose does the Senator rise?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I rise to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bonus bill just failed of passage.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That motion will be entered.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I enter the motion, which means that I give notice that at some future date the motion will be called up.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I make the point of order that there is a motion pending before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is one motion pending, and that takes precedence.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma has a right to enter the motion; but the motion can not be proceeded with, because there is already a motion pending.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Is the notice just given of entrance of a motion at this time acknowledged by the Chair?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I will state that if either the Senator from Oklahoma or the Senator from Alabama wishes now to make a motion to reconsider the vote by which the so-called bonus bill was defeated, I shall withdraw my motion in the interest of the present consideration of the motion to reconsider; but, as everyone understands, entry of a motion or notice of a motion is not a motion itself. The Chair was entirely correct, in my judgment, when he held that the announcement by the Senator from Alabama of his purpose to make a motion to reconsider did not bring the question before the Senate.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will make the motion to reconsider.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield for that purpose?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield for that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama makes a motion——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Alabama if he desires now to make the motion to reconsider. If he merely wishes to make a speech, I shall insist upon the motion I have made.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I stated in the beginning that I had no purpose to delay the final disposition of the bill; but I did hope that I would have a reasonable opportunity to explain what I was going to offer in the event the Senate agreed to reconsider.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. REED. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bonus bill was just defeated.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. What is the point of order?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The point of order is that I myself have given notice that at some future time I would move to reconsider the vote; and that that notice having been received, a motion to reconsider at this time is out of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The giving of a notice is not a motion; and under the rule the motion can be made at any time within two days. The Chair holds that the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania is in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. I move, then, to lay the motion of the Senator on the table.

Mr. ASHURST. O Mr. President, do not do that. Let us vote on it now.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I shall insist on my motion. If a vote can be had on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania to reconsider the vote, I shall not object; but if it merely means that debate is to proceed, I shall insist on the motion that I have made.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, if the Senator from Arkansas will yield, I will free him from any such necessity. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. That motion is not debatable.

Mr. BLAINE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Copeland	Hebert	Robinson, Ind.
Austin	Costigan	Johnson	Schall
Bankhead	Couzens	Jones	Sheppard
Barbour	Dale	Kean	Shortridge

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-two Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] to lay the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] on the table.

Several Senators demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE (when Mr. CUTTING's name was called). Making the same announcement as on the previous vote with regard to the pair of the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING] with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS], I wish to announce that if the junior Senator from New Mexico were present he would vote "nay."

Mr. GLENN (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] to the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] and vote "yea."

Mr. HATFIELD (when his name was called). Repeating my previous announcement respecting my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. PITTMAN (when his name was called). Reannouncing my pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], I desire to state that I do not know how that Senator would vote on this matter if he were present. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as on the previous vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as on the previous vote, I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. FLETCHER], who has a pair for the remainder of the evening with the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD].

Mr. GLASS (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM], and, being advised that he would vote as I have voted, I will let my vote stand.

Mr. FRAZIER. My colleague [Mr. NYE] is paired with the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY]. If present, my colleague would vote "nay."

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN], and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] are necessarily detained from the Senate. If they were present, all these Senators would vote "yea."

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] is unavoidably detained from the Senate attending the funeral of the late Representative Eslick. He has a pair with the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. BULOW].

The result was announced—yeas 44, nays 26, as follows:

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I desire to take only a moment or two of the time of the Senate. I had wanted an opportunity to express myself briefly in regard to the so-called bonus bill prior to the taking of the vote, but there was such restlessness, and such a demand on the part of a great many Senators to vote, that I did not feel like imposing myself on the Senate at a time when there was such a demand for a vote on the bill that the Senate was really in a state of disorder.

I am sincerely in favor of a cash bonus being paid to the ex-service men on their compensation certificates. I believe, in justice, under the present circumstances an equitable and just payment should be paid to them. But as to the plan which should be adopted, that is a matter of detail, and, of course, the details are of great importance. I was not impressed favorably with the plan that was carried in the bill under consideration, although I am strongly for allowing a cash settlement.

To the surprise of almost everyone and unfortunately, no one was allowed to offer any amendment after 2 or 3 o'clock this afternoon, with a view to trying to perfect the bill according to the idea of a number who were the real friends of the idea of a cash bonus. Several who are in favor of a cash settlement, among them myself, but who thought a better plan for this purpose could be adopted by amending the bill were unduly shut off from offering amendments. We were left with only two courses to follow; that is, to vote for the bill with its objectionable features or else vote against it.

Therefore we had confronting us only the proposition of the bill as it came from the House, with no opportunity whatever to offer amendments. A number of us who favor a cash bonus also had confronting us the fact that it was well known by everyone in this Senate that the bill in the form that it came from the House was going to be defeated by an overwhelming majority. It was under these circumstances that I voted against the bill. I knew a motion to reconsider was going to be made and that it was the intention to endeavor then to make some amendments that would be satisfactory to all who wanted to allow a cash settlement on the certificates. I hope the motion to reconsider will prevail and then there could be an opportunity to perfect the bill and obtain at least a reasonable allowance in the nature of cash compensation for the veterans.

The drastic tactics that have been adopted, however, following the motion to reconsider, in the nature of a motion to lay that motion on the table, precluded any opportunity for further consideration of the question. I very much regret that that course has been pursued, but a majority seem to agree with it. I am disappointed that by such unusual tactics, and I believe unwarranted facts, we are under the rules now precluded from trying yet to amend the bill so as to provide for a cash settlement.

LOANS TO STATES—SYSTEM OF HIGHWAYS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 12445, to relieve destitution, to broaden the lending powers of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and to create employment by authorizing and expediting a public-works program and providing a method of financing such program.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency with amendments.

CONFIRMATION OF VIRGINIA POSTMASTERS

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent, as in executive session, for the confirmation of five postmasters in Virginia to whom there are no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the nominations be reported for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the nominations of Charles G. Thomas to be postmaster at Fork Union, of Frank G. Jones to be postmaster at Montvale, of Arthur B. Parker to be postmaster at Onancock, of Amos L. Cannaday to be postmaster at Pulaski, and of Herbert C. Bolton to be postmaster at St. Paul, all in the State of Virginia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the nominations are confirmed.

RELIEF FROM GRASSHOPPER INVASION

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a telegram from the governor of my State regarding the grasshopper situation and other telegrams bearing on the same subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The telegrams are as follows:

PIERRE, S. DAK., June 15, 1932.

Hon. PETER NORBECK,
Senate Chamber, Washington:

Although grasshoppers are not yet eating our grain they are here; and should weather become favorable for their development, serious damage to crops would result. It would be advisable to use your best efforts to secure appropriation for grasshopper relief.

WARREN GREEN, Governor.

EUREKA, S. DAK., June 15, 1932.

Hon. PETER NORBECK,
Washington:

Examined grain fields this morning. Inquired of farmers. Grasshopper danger rapidly increasing. Help badly needed.

THEO. GIEDT.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., June 16, 1932.

Hon. PETER NORBECK,
United States Senator:

Representing 2,000 retail hardware merchants, we urge you to work for financial aid to fight grasshoppers in the Northwest.

MINNESOTA AND SOUTH DAKOTA RETAIL HARDWARE ASSOCIATIONS.

WATERTOWN, S. DAK., June 17, 1932.

Hon. PETER NORBECK,
United States Senate:

Wish I might be able to take you through fields in this State so you could see grasshopper conditions; so you could see them as we do. Crops generally look good at this time of year; but when it gets dry in July and August, vegetation drys up. The hoppers will take the crops. We hate to think of the outcome. Please put all possible energy behind appropriation for poison bait.

We can not get help from State or county. You are the one man in Washington we look to for help. It is not too late if we get immediate action.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., June 16, 1932.

Senator PETER NORBECK,
United States Senate, Washington:

Supplementing telegram 14th sent Secretary Hyde, Speaker Garner, and Congressman Andresen, we have further investigated grasshopper situation. Can report that Minnesota can and will take care of situation in Minnesota without Federal aid. We are equally certain that funds are needed immediately for North and South Dakota and Montana. Even a week's delay would probably necessitate much larger amount. If $500,000 could be immediately available for these three States, we believe situation can be satisfactorily handled. Legal situation in these States makes immediate appropriations impossible, and financial condition of counties involved is such that funds could not be raised for immediate use anyway. Arrangements will be made to advance money if we can have Government's assurance that we will be reimbursed. Please address E. W. Decker, Northwestern National Bank, Minneapolis.

A. R. Rogers, chairman Minneapolis industrial committee; B. B. Sheffield, president Minneapolis Civic and Commerce Association; L. E. Wakefield, president First National Bank; E. L. Carpenter, president Shevlin Carpenter & Clarke Co.; E. W. Decker, president Northwestern National Bank; W. A. Durst, president Minnesota Loan & Trust Co.; F. T. Heffelfinger, president F. H. Peavey & Co.; Geo. D. Dayton, president the Dayton Co.; C. T. Jaffray, president Soo Line Railroad; Thos. J. Wallace, president Farmers & Mechanics Savings Bank; Carl W. Jones, publisher the Minneapolis Journal; F. E. Murphy, publisher the Minneapolis Tribune; John Thompson, publisher the Minneapolis Star; J. H. Macmillan, president Cargill Elevator Co.

PETER NORBECK:

Grasshopper condition becoming serious. Urge Government relief immediately for protection of Federal seed securities. Destitution among our farmers this winter. Condition serious.

BERNARD W. PENNY,
Chairman Bennett County Seed Loan Committee.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, JUNE 17, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. RAINEY].

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Come with us, Blessed Father. Always enable us to stand before all men's eyes as men with a message, men with a spirit, men who have found courage, strength, and understanding sufficient to serve wisely and encouragingly the welfare of the Republic. Help us to rise to our highest manhood and covet our opportunity. Preserve those human flowers for our pathways, namely, friendship, comradeship, trust, and harmony; these shed a fragrance that we ought not to miss. As our duties are urgent, vital, and imperative, Blessed Lord, ignore our weakness, give zest to our knowledge, and strengthen us to do all good things. May we be endowed with a courageous persistence to work for the good of all the people all the time. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 11452. An act making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes.

BOARD OF REGENTS OF THE SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call for immediate consideration House Joint Resolution 408, filling certain vacancies on the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the House joint resolution, as follows:

House Joint Resolution 408

Resolved, etc., That the vacancies in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, of the class other than Members of Congress, which now exist, be filled by the appointment of R. Walton Moore, of Virginia; Robert W. Bingham, of Kentucky; and Augustus P. Loring, of Massachusetts.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Kentucky if the Board of Regents are supposed to be filled by Members of the House of Representatives?

Mr. GILBERT. These are authorized to be filled from the civilian list.

Under the act approved August 10, 1846, it was provided that the Smithsonian Institution be conducted by a Board of Regents to be composed of the Vice President of the United States, the Chief Justice of the United States, and the mayor of the city of Washington; 3 Members of the Senate and 3 Members of the House of Representatives, together with 6 other persons other than Members of Congress, 2 of whom shall be members of the National Institute in the city of Washington and reside in said city, and the other 4 shall be inhabitants of States, and no two of them of the same State. The Members of the Senate are appointed by the President of the Senate. The Members of the House are appointed by the Speaker thereof, and the six other persons are appointed by the joint resolution of the Senate and the House of Representatives. The Members of the Senate serve during their 6-year term as Senator, the Members of the House for the 2-year term of their service in the House, and the citizen members serve for 6 years.

The present membership is as follows:

Vice President Curtis; Chief Justice Hughes; Senators SMOOT, of Utah; ROBINSON, of Arkansas; and SWANSON, of Virginia; Representatives JOHNSON, of Washington; CRUMP, of Tennessee; GOLDSBOROUGH, of Maryland; and the following citizen Regents; Irwin B. Laughlin, of Pennsylvania; Frederick A. Delano, of Washington, D. C.; and John C. Merriam, of Washington, D. C.

The three members, R. Walton Moore, of Virginia; Robert W. Bingham, of Kentucky; and Augustus P. Loring, of Massachusetts, to fill the vacancies provided for in this resolution, comply in all respects with the law and are especially fitted for this important and patriotic service. They receive no salary other than necessary traveling expenses. The three gentlemen suggested in this resolution are men of splendid intelligence, patriotism, and executive ability; they have, in the event of their approval, signified a willingness to give their time and talents to this Government service and the committee feels that it is fortunate in being permitted to suggest them for the approval of the Congress.

The House joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PRINTING OF LAWS RELATING TO WAR VETERANS

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I call up Senate Concurrent Resolution 29.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the letter of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, dated May 12, 1932, transmitting, in response to Senate Resolution 412 (71st Cong.), a compilation of all Federal laws relating to the veterans of our various wars, be printed, with illustrations, as a Senate document; and that 15,000 additional copies shall be printed for distribution by the Veterans' Administration, of which there may be furnished, upon written application to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, one copy to each post of the Grand Army of the Republic, the American Legion, and the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, to each camp of the United Spanish War Veterans, and to each chapter of the Disabled American Veterans of the World War.

With the following committee amendment:

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to explain the purpose of this resolution briefly. A year ago, by resolution, I believe, of Congress—at least of the Senate—the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs was requested to compile the laws relating to the care of and provision for veterans of all wars that are now being dealt with. The Administrator has by a great deal of work and labor, with the use of a very able commission, prepared very carefully that compilation, and it is ready to be printed.

The Veterans' Administration had no money with which to print it.. They therefore transmitted it to the Senate, which requested the compilation, and the Senate passed a resolution to print it, which the Veterans' Administration had a right to do if they had had the money, but the appropriation was exhausted.

The necessity for it is that the camps all over the country, a part of the veterans' organization, are practically ignorant of what the laws are, and when applied to by the veterans for information and assistance in filing their claims they find need of it, and that is the reason why the Senate has passed this resolution.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Is there any provision made in the resolution for Members receiving copies?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes; each Member receives one copy and each Senator two.

Mr. UNDERHILL. How much will it cost?

Mr. STEVENSON. Thirteen thousand dollars. As the Senate passed it, it would cost $18,000, but we have cut down that number from 15,000 to 10,000, which we think will be ample.

Mr. UNDERHILL. It could be cut more than that.

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not think so. There are 10,000 camps in the American Legion, and most of them want it. Then I propose to offer an amendment for the Red Cross, which has some 3,500 chapters, and we recognize the Red Cross as one agency that deals with the veteran soldiers.

While it is expensive, and while it is coming out of the appropriation for congressional printing, and should not, yet it is the only way that we can handle it for the benefit of the numerous veterans of the whole United States. While on my feet I think I should say that this Congress recognizes the fact that the veterans who have been camped about here have demonstrated their sense of responsibility, their recognition of constituted authority, and have manifested the fruits of discipline in war as no such body of men that could be assembled anywhere would demonstrate. [Applause.] There has not been an untoward incident, there has not been an act of insubordination, there has not been anything done by those thousands of men who are here asking for what they conceive to be their rights in the weeks they have been here that deserves censure, and I think, in recognition of their lack of display of any temper and in recognition of their splendid decorum and restraint in the trying situation in which they have found themselves, that we owe them at least the duty to give to their camps the laws whereby they can be protected from the sharks who make them the victims of overcharges and all that sort of thing in seeking their rights.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENSON. I offer another amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STEVENSON: Page 2, line 2, after the word "veterans," insert "to each camp of veterans of the Indian wars, each chapter of the American Red Cross."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. ALMON. It occurs to me that each Representative will need two copies, as some of us have an office at home during vacation and also one in Washington. What would 500 additional copies cost?

Mr. STEVENSON. Five thousand copies cost about $2,000, and 500 would cost about one-fourth of that. I do not think it is necessary to add to the number; but if the House desires that each Member have two copies, as the Senate gets, I shall cheerfully move to amend in that particular.

Mr. BALDRIGE. Mr. Speaker, is there any demand or request from the various posts for these laws?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes. If the gentleman could see the number of communications that I have had since this came over from the Senate—from the Red Cross and from Legion men all over the country—he would realize that they want these.

Mr. BALDRIGE. I appreciate what the gentleman has said about the good behavior of these men here, particularly when we remember the appeal to class prejudice and hatred made on the floor of the House just the other day.

It is quite fitting that they be given the praise the gentleman has bestowed; but at the same time I am wondering about any request or demand for these copies. This is to cost $15,000, is it not?

Mr. STEVENSON. Thirteen thousand dollars.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. In reply to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BALDRIGE], of course, the expression he used about class prejudice was directed at those who voted to pay for the adjusted-service certificates. He evidently does not refer to those friends of the international bankers who opposed it.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, no; I took it just the other way. I think the gentleman was referring to those Republicans who tried to kill the bonus bill.

Mr. BALDRIGE. I will say to the gentlemen from Mississippi and Texas that only wounded birds flutter.

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not yield for a controversy of that character.

Mr. RANKIN. All unprotected birds flutter before birds of prey.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on agreeing to the Senate concurrent resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

REVIEW OF THE RECORD OF THIS CONGRESS

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on legislation in this session of Congress. The remarks I have prepared contain no quotations.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Speaker, this session of Congress is drawing to a close. The country is in distress. It is foolish to try to close our eyes to this situation. The Nation has a surplus of all of the necessities of life, yet there are millions in distress. This situation clearly shows that the distribution system in this country has broken down. It has broken down because the people are unable to make enough to buy the things which they need. If the people of this country were able to consume all that they need, it is questionable whether or not we should be bothered with the problem of overproduction when there is an underconsumption in this country.

It is true that there is a world-wide depression. However, the depression abroad can not be the principal cause of our troubles. In the peak of our prosperity our foreign markets only accounted for about 7 per cent of all of our markets. Ninety-three per cent of our markets were here at home. We have lost about two-thirds of our foreign markets. If we had lost all of them, that would only account for a 7 per cent loss in our markets. If our home markets could be held intact, we should still have 93 per cent of all of the markets which we ever had. This depression has reached such proportions that it is obvious that our principal loss of market is in the loss of our home market. A complete loss of our foreign markets or a 7 per cent loss of our total markets could not be responsible for the terrific depression which we are suffering.

I wish to discuss what appear to me to be some of the principal causes of the loss of our home markets. By the loss of our home markets I mean the inability of the American people to buy what they want and need.

I think the principal cause of the loss of our home markets is the breakdown and the impoverishment of agriculture. There are 27,000,000 farm people. When they do not have the funds with which to buy the products of American industry, then American industry has lost its one best market. It begins to lose money and casts men into unemployment. With the industrial sections losing money and casting men into unemployment, there is a decreased consumption of American farm products and the price of farm products will go still lower.

I do not think that the American farmer has gone broke since 1929. I think he went broke from 1920 to 1929, and since 1929 he has simply gone down farther into bankruptcy with the rest of the country. The American farmer went broke from 1920 to 1929 primarily because he was being robbed whenever he bought the products of industry, paid his taxes, and paid transportation charges for marketing his products. In other words, from 1920 to 1929 American industry, finance, transportation, and Government were taking too much from the farmer. During these 10 years the farmer was able to buy on his reserve and with the people engaged in industry, finance, transportation, and the Government collecting so heavily from the farmer, they prospered greatly at the expense of absorbing his reserve and driving him into bankruptcy.

By 1929 the farmer was at the end of the road. He could no longer buy the products of industry. Industry lost its American farm market. It began to lose money and cast labor into unemployment. The result is that during the last two years there have been some 9,000,000 people driven from industry and transportation into unemployment. They are no longer able to consume the products of the American farm. This has destroyed the demand for American agricultural products. As a result the prices of farm products have gone lower and lower, and the American farmer is more unable to buy the products of American industry.

The Government, industry, and transportation have not tried to correct this situation. The Government has continued to collect higher taxes, industry has continued to charge its excessive prices, and transportation has not reduced its rates, but, on the contrary, it has increased them. Until Government brings down its taxes, industry brings down its prices, and transportation brings down its charges to some sort of a parity with farm prices, I can see no way for the farmer to be able to sell his products, so that he can pay his taxes, buy the products of industry, putting men back to work in the factory, and ship his products on the railroads placing men back to work in transportation.

Until these men go back to work, they can not buy the products of the American farm. So long as they are not buying the products of the American farm it is going to be impossible to obtain a fair price for these farm products. Therefore I can see no way out of the present distress until industry, transportation, and government show a disposition to reduce taxes, industrial prices, and transportation charges for the American farmer. This is a vicious cycle in which we find ourselves.

I can not see how the Government is going to benefit permanently the situation any by providing credit for American finance, American industry, and American transportation, since they went broke not because they needed credit but because they were overcharging the farmer. So long as they are keeping up their charges, the lending of money to them only prolongs the agony.

Until we can get the unemployed men back to work in industry so that they can consume the food produced by the American farm we can not control our market for the American farm. Many of these men in industry are out of work on account of the invention of modern machinery. This modern machinery has not been used so much to reduce labor as it has been to cast men into unemployment.

Instead of using this machinery to reduce the number of employed, it must be used to shorten the hours of labor of those who are employed. An unemployed man is not alone in distress; he carries down to distress American agriculture, American industry, and the rest of the Nation. He can not work. He has no money with which to buy the things he needs. When he can not buy food, clothing, and other necessities, those who have these things to sell are bound to suffer for the want of a market. Using modern machinery to cast men out of employment has spread human misery throughout the land. There is only one way to use modern machinery so as not to create unemployment and deny millions the opportunity to earn a living; that is, to reduce the hours of labor so that the labor will be divided among more people. The use of modern machinery by retaining the same hours of labor and reducing the number employed can mean only one end, and that is millions of people out of work with no opportunity to buy the necessities of life. That breaks down the distribution system. The shortening of the hours of labor and getting these men back to work is not alone a problem of the unemployed; it is the problem of American agriculture, finance, industry, transportation, and government.

Is it any wonder that the American distribution system has broken down when we have used science for the deliberate purpose of creating unemployment and denying the opportunity to labor to millions of American people? Until these men go to work it not only means less income for all of the rest of the citizens but it is bound to mean more and more taxation. Hungry people are bound to be a financial burden upon government and thereby increase taxation. This Government can not survive and this can not be a Christian nation unless these people who have been denied any opportunity to work are supplied with food.

If this unemployment continues, it is going to break down this Government and bring immeasurable chaos to this country. The shortening of the hours of labor will put millions of men back to work. As they go back to work and are able to buy the products, this would create a demand for agriculture and industrial products, which would put others to work in supplying this demand. The shortening of the hours of labor is a sound, practical, and permanent way of meeting the unemployment problem. This means of meeting the unemployment problem will save government. If it is not met, government will be destroyed.

If government bears the responsibility of financing indefinitely the needs of the unemployed, the Government is bound to be hopelessly bankrupt.

The distribution system could not help but be broken down in this country because the thousands of local communities have been drained of their financial sustenance. As these local communities have been drained of their money, the people residing in these communities become impoverished and are no longer able to buy the products of industry and of agriculture. These communities have not been accidentally drained of their wealth. They have been drained of their wealth as a result of a well-planned and deliberate program of establishing absentee ownership of all local business. I refer to the chain stores and all forms of chain institutions which are located in local communities and daily draining the profits away from these communities.

A child knowing enough about arithmetic to subtract should be able to see that a system which daily takes away from a community all the profits derived from the things which the people of that community eat and wear and otherwise utilize will in a period of time impoverish that community. For eight or nine years this system has been going on in all of the local communities of the country. They have reached the point where they are impoverished. Since they are impoverished they can no longer buy the products of industry. Naturally industry has lost its market. With its market lost, it is facing bankruptcy.

This vicious absentee-ownership system is not alone the problem of the merchant or the individual who has been driven out of business. It is not alone the problem of the people of the community which has been impoverished. It is a problem of all of the people of this country. The citizens of these local communities have been penny-wise and pound-foolish and have willingly given their support to the system which has now impoverished them.

How can the carpenter and the bricklayer expect any work in his community after he has day by day turned his money over to these institutions which immediately ship this money out of town? With the money gone, there is no money left in his community with which to employ him.

How can the farmer expect any local market for his products if he has day by day given his money to institutions which the next day sent it out of town? If the money is gone, there is no way for him to expect the people of his community to have money with which to buy his products.

This session of Congress has not touched top, side, or bottom of any movement to correct the evils which have impoverished the country and broken down our distribution system. Every relief program has meant increased taxes which have only increased one of the principal causes of our trouble. I refer to the bleeding of American agriculture, industry, and transportation by taxation. The lending of money to banks so that they may extend credit to an industrial system which has impoverished itself and the country while it still carries on its present course of discrimination against agriculture, and can not, in the long run, better conditions. It prolongs the agony of agriculture, and only postpones the ultimate day when industry can regain its market so that it can manufacture its articles at a price so that farmers can buy them. Providing credit for railroads that are bankrupt because they have lost their volume of business, largely due to their maintaining transportation charges at a level which agriculture can not pay, only prolongs the agony of agriculture and postpones the eventual and inevitable bankruptcy of the transportation system.

Endeavoring to furnish employment and increasing taxation in order to do so to take care of men who have been cast out of work on account of modern machinery only tides these people over a little longer.

Until industry and transportation bring down their charges, there is no permanent relief to be gained by lending them money. Until the hours of labor are shortened so that men can go back to work, there is no permanent solution for the unemployed. It is perfectly proper for government to tide over industry, finance, and transportation if industry, finance, and transportation were getting their house in order and really correcting the wrongs which they inflicted upon this country. It is not my purpose to criticize the effort of Congress to try to bolster up a tottering financial and business structure in this country. Except for the emergency measures this Congress has enacted, I am inclined to believe that there would have been a nation-wide failure of banks and insurance companies, which would have meant intolerable misery for the millions of bank depositors and insurance policyholders. It is my purpose to make plain that these measures were in the nature of administering narcotics to a dying man. The narcotics may pull such a man through the night but he is not a well man until he is able to be on a substantial diet. These emergency measures may have pulled the country through for the time being but this will not be a well country until the distribution system is reestablished by correcting the basic evils in our economic and financial structure, which have contributed so greatly to the breakdown of our distribution system and our present national distress.

If industry were shortening the hours of labor and getting men back to work, there could be some hope for the future found in Government aid for the unemployed pending the time they get back to work. The most that the Government can do is to try to hold things together for a temporary period while the readjustment is being made. If industry and transportation were bringing down their charges and the hours of labor were being shortened, the program which the Government is following during this session of Congress would be sound and have promise for the future. The carrying out of our present program with no effort being made to shorten the hours of labor and with industry and transportation stubbornly retaining the postwar inflated prices offers nothing for the future except unemployment, increased taxes, and an inevitable breakdown of the Government.

Government must begin doing everything it can to force down industrial and transportation charges to some sort of a level with agriculture prices, to force a reduction in the hours of labor, and to destroy the chain system which is impoverishing local communities. It is true that the power of Government to accomplish this purpose is greatly limited by the constitutional restrictions thrown around Congress. With the exception of high taxes, Government did not bring this situation on to the people.

Business inflicted the chain system onto the American people. Industry and transportation highly monopolized and arrogantly forced their high prices upon the American people. Industry and transportation have to bring down these prices in order to save themselves and their country. Loyalty to country and their own economic preservation demand that they correct the wrongs which they perpetrated upon the country by reducing the industrial prices and transportation charges. Business must call off its chain invasion upon all of the local communities in order to save itself and the Government. Government from Washington down to the school district must reduce its expenses and quit bleeding the producers of this country by excessive taxation.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. HENRY ST. GEORGE TUCKER, is detained in Virginia on account of illness. He has requested me to say to the House, respecting his vote upon H. R. 12445, commonly known as the Garner relief bill, as follows, and I quote:

Through some misunderstanding, pairing me in favor of this bill was a mistake. If I had been present, I would have voted against the bill.

ANTIKIDNAPING

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 250, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 5657, a bill forbidding the transportation of any person in interstate or foreign commerce, kidnaped or otherwise unlawfully detained. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on the Judiciary, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Does the gentleman from Indiana desire any time?

Mr. PURNELL. I have some requests for time.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, time on this side is very limited. The chairman of the committee may exhaust most of it so that the other members on the majority side will not have any time. Will the gentleman be willing to yield some of his time to members of the committee on this side?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Under the rule there is one hour of general debate. Does the gentleman think that will not be enough?

Mr. CELLER. The chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] has just assured me that it will be all right.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield me as much as two minutes?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I shall.

Mr. Speaker, this is a rule to consider the kidnaping bill. H. R. 5657 was introduced in the House by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN]. That bill carried the death penalty for kidnaping. Before that bill had been passed the Senate passed the bill S. 1525, which did not include the death penalty, but left it to the discretion of the judge to inflict as many years' imprisonment as the judge sees fit. I understand the Senate bill is agreeable to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN], under the circumstances, and that the Senate bill be substituted for the House bill. So I offer an amendment to the resolution.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. We do not want any misunderstanding about this. The gentleman in some way has gotten into error with regard to the attitude of the Committee on the Judiciary in the House. The House Judiciary Committee is not agreeable to substituting the Senate bill for the House bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR. If I misled the gentleman, I am sorry. I intended to say to substitute the Senate bill for consideration only. Of course, the Senate bill will then be open to amendment, and the House bill could be substituted for the Senate bill.

I offer an amendment to the resolution, Mr. Speaker, which is at the Clerk's desk.

Amendment offered by Mr. O'CONNOR: Page 1, line 4, strike out "H. R. 5657" down to the period in line 6, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "S. 1525. A bill forbidding the transportation of any person in interstate commerce, kidnaped or otherwise unlawfully detained, and making such act a felony."

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, there seems to be some confusion over this matter. Some of us on the Rules Committee were advised that this procedure was denied, that we consider the Senate bill instead of the House bill, the Senate having passed the bill. Of course, the Senate bill will be open to amendment.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Certainly.

Mr. MICHENER. It is, as I understand, for the purpose of considering the Senate bill in order to expedite matters, and that the Senate bill will be open to amendment, so that we may amend it to conform with the House bill if we see fit.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Exactly.

Mr. DOMINICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I shall.

Mr. DOMINICK. It seems to me the proper procedure in the matter would be to consider the House bill and then later substitute that for the Senate bill and pass the Senate bill.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If the gentleman will yield, that is what we tried to do with the injunction bill and one objection prevented us from doing it, and we were for several hours in a very unpleasant parliamentary tangle, at the mercy of one objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR. We were advised by the Parliamentarian and determined ourselves that this was the most expeditious method of handling it.

Mr. DOMINICK. I just wanted it understood that that plan was not the plan of the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. O'CONNOR. That information comes to us at this moment for the first time.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I think we can straighten it out. Will the gentleman yield in order for me to submit a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. For the purpose of submitting a parliamentary inquiry, I assume the present occupant of the Chair understands I do not know anything about parliamentary procedure, but it is the desire of the Committee on the Judiciary to have the House consider and stand by the House bill. I understand the Senate bill is now on the Speaker's desk. We want to take advantage of that fact in order to expedite the procedure, but not to have ourselves cut off from an opportunity to consider and insist upon the House agreeing to the provisions of the House bill.

With that statement of the attitude of the committee I yield myself to the guidance of the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WOODRUM). The Chair is advised that the gentleman has a right, when considering the bill in Committee of the Whole, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the House bill. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DYER. I would like to ask just what is the parliamentary situation now with regard to this legislation?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will be in order to move to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider the bill as soon as debate is closed on the rule.

Mr. DYER. In other words, we will consider the Senate bill under the rule and not the House bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes.

Mr. GARBER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. GARBER. With the exception of the death penalty referred to, is the Senate bill the same as the House bill?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Well, I am not as familiar with the details of the bill as the members of the Judiciary Committee are, but I believe the bills are in many respects different.

Mr. MONTAGUE. May I suggest that the Senate bill will be considered for amendment? Does not the gentleman from Michigan understand it that way?

Mr. MICHENER. We will consider the Senate bill, and, of course, we can strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the House bill if we desire.

Mr. MONTAGUE. And the Senate bill is open for amendment under such a situation?

Mr. MICHENER. Certainly.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Is it not a fact that the action taken on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York would extend to the Senate the courtesy to which it is entitled, to consider the Senate bill, it already having passed that body, and that the language in the House bill can be substituted for the Senate bill when it is under consideration?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Well, I did not have that lofty motive in mind. I was attempting to expedite the passage of the legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I am in hopes that my colleague the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS], chairman of the Judiciary Committee, and the gentleman from New York will cooperate in making this bill apply to a case such as that dastardly crime of Gaston Means. It ought to apply to such cases. The infamous offense that he committed is one of the most heinous and despicable crimes that could be imagined.

I have never been in favor of a whipping post, but instead of giving that man 15 years they ought to put a whipping post out in front of this Capitol and they ought to whip him for 48 hours without stopping.

Then they ought to hang him. [Laughter.] The idea of letting such contemptible, murderous racketeers get away with crimes like that in the Nation's Capital! We ought to put an amendment in this bill to reach that kind of skunks.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUFF. I may say to the gentleman that if he will support an amendment I intend to offer to one of the provisions of the bill, I think the bill will reach a case like that.

Mr. BLANTON. I for one will support the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to take up any time. Debate on the resolution is limited. I merely want to say that in all the category of crime, none, to my mind, is more dastardly than that of kidnaping. I am happy to have an opportunity to-day to help perfect a bill which will more effectively reach this crime.

The Nation still mourns with the Lindbergh family in the loss of their son. Out of this tragedy, however, has come a demand for more drastic legislation with which to meet the heartless advance of those who would kidnap and kill. That demand finds response here to-day in this bill. I am convinced that before we adjourn we shall see enacted into law a bill designed to so strengthen the arm of the Federal Government as to instill a greater amount of fear into those who make up this class of criminals. The resolution should be adopted speedily and unanimously. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER], who is also a member of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, Congress can only pass such legislation as is authorized by the Constitution. We must look to the Constitution for authority, while all authority not expressly vested in Congress by the Constitution remains in the States.

The bill which is soon to be before us does not and can not deal with the crime of kidnaping, but provides "that whoever shall knowingly transport or cause to be transported, or knowingly aids or abets in transporting in interstate or foreign commerce, any person who shall have been unlawfully kidnaped," and so forth, shall be punished as in the bill set forth. The unlawful act which we are attempting to reach in this legislation is the act of transporting "in interstate or foreign commerce," which in plain language means transporting from one State, Territory, or the District of Columbia to another State or Territory, and so forth. In my judgment, this legislation would not be on the floor of the House to-day were it not for the recent distressing Lindbergh kidnaping case. Had this bill been the law at that time it would have in no wise affected the Lindbergh case.

Congress should be very careful about enacting additional criminal statutes punishing for crime, when the same result can be obtained through State legislation. Whenever you remove responsibility from the local community to Washington, to that extent you lessen the interest of the local community in the enforcement of the law. Let the States make their own laws wherever possible, and then those same States being responsible for the laws will enforce them. Where we have State statutes and Federal statutes dealing with the same subject matter, there is too often the sentiment in the community that Uncle Sam has assumed the responsibility and should carry the burden.

Of course there are cases where persons commit crime and flee across the State line. The pursuing State officer is halted at the State line, and this bill attempts to remedy that condition. In localities like St. Louis, Mo., and East St. Louis, Ill.—where, in reality there is but one city, with a State line between—legislation of this kind will be very helpful, but on the whole I am wondering whether or not it is advisable to extend Federal powers generally.

The people of the country do not, as a rule, appreciate the necessary limitations placed upon Congress in these matters, and many an editorial during recent months has wondered that Congress has not long ago passed legislation to punish perpetrators of crime like the Lindbergh kidnaping. Most of the States have drastic statutes covering this subject, and, as a matter of fact, all of the States should give attention to the necessity of increasing penalties and tightening up the law in so far as kidnaping is concerned. Because of the publicity in this particular case I think it is fair to say that the people who are not advised are demanding this legislation.

The Judiciary Committee appreciated this situation, and section 2 of the bill was apparently written in an effort to retain authority in the States and at the same time permit Federal cooperation. I was not present in the committee when this section was drafted. I consider it clumsy and out of place and do not believe that it is workable, regardless of the good intentions of the authors.

I shall not indulge in further discussion of the bill at this time but want to impress upon the Congress that every time we pass a measure of this type we create more authority in Washington. We extend the power of the departments and bureaus, and we assume burdens which should not be borne by the Federal Government. This bill, if enacted into law, will in rare cases be used in the punishment of kidnapers, but if it will give any relief in distressing cases its passage is possibly justified; and for that reason I shall vote for the bill when properly amended, but give notice now that this must not become a precedent for more legislation giving the Federal Government concurrent authority with the States in enforcing police regulations and laws dealing with matters in which the States are primarily interested, and which can be properly dealt with by State action.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the author of the House bill, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN].

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Michigan is in error when he says this bill would not have come before the House had it not been for the Lindbergh case.

Four years ago I introduced in the House a bill which was directed at kidnaping. That bill was to amend the postal laws so as to make it a felony to use the mails to demand ransom where a person had been kidnaped. I secured favorable reports from the Post Office Department upon that bill. The bill passed the House, is in the Senate, is on the calendar in the Senate, and the first day the Senate Calendar is called it will be passed. Of this I am positive.

This bill was introduced in the House the early part of December, long before the Lindbergh kidnaping took place. It was introduced to meet a situation that confronted State police where the police are powerless, when the criminals cross the State line. I might say the gangsters who kidnap our citizens are not ignorant men. It has developed they are well educated, cunning criminals who are well versed in criminal law. They will be the first to know of the enactment of this bill.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. MICHENER. I did not mean to say that no bills had been introduced, but I did mean to say, and I think I express the sentiment of the committee, that bills of this type would not be reported. There are all kinds of bills introduced every year making all kinds of occurrences crimes against the Federal Government.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I will say to the gentleman that the bill would have been before the House whether the Committee on the Judiciary had reported it or not, because I would have invoked the discharge rule if the committee had not reported it. I am sure sufficient signatures could have been secured.

There is fear throughout the country at this time and a great deal of that fear is in the hearts of the mothers of this country and has been brought about by the Lindbergh case. It is the duty of this Congress to stamp out that fear, and it is the duty of this Congress to let every mother of this country know that her child, no matter how humble her station in life may be, or her husband, is going to receive from the United States Government the same assistance that was given in the Lindbergh case. I do not object to the assistance that was given in the Lindbergh case, but it was given entirely without any authority of law; and the money spent by the United States Government, although it was well spent, was spent without any authority of law.

The gentleman from Michigan says the States should perfect their laws. The State from which I come provides capital punishment in the case of kidnaping. Just yesterday, in Kansas City, on a plea of guilty, the kidnaper who forcibly took a well-known woman of Kansas City, Mrs. Nell Donnelly, across into another State and held her there for ransom, was given life in the penitentiary. The State of Missouri went all the way to South Africa to bring that man back for trial. Four or five of his confederates are already in the penitentiary. I think that is a sufficient answer for the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MICHENER. That is just the point I was making, that the States can and the States should do that very thing; and that the Federal Government should be careful about passing laws which take away from the States the responsibility which is theirs.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I will say to the gentleman from Michigan that our experience in the city of St. Louis and in Kansas City has been such that our hands have been tied. When the criminals take their victims across the State line the police powers of our State end; and much as I dislike to say so, in some instances it has been said by our police department and other police departments that when they go across a State line they sometimes go into territory that might be termed friendly territory.

All we ask is that if the victim is taken out of the jurisdiction of a State one man in the Department of Justice be assigned and he can take the local police, go to another jurisdiction, and keep on the trail of those who are responsible for holding the person kidnaped.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I thank the gentleman. Let me say that at the outset gangsters were victims of gangsters in this kidnaping racket. They then turned to the gambler, the bookmaker, and have taken millions from that class. Then, after that field was destroyed, they turned to the business man. In my own community I think the last outstanding kidnaping case, just a few months ago, was that of a very rich fur merchant of St. Louis. Six of the seven who were implicated in that kidnaping are now in the penitentiary, and it has not been more than six months since the crime was committed. Just prior to that one of our leading specialists in St. Louis, a physician, was kidnaped and held for 10 days. Of course, the family denies it, but, nevertheless, it is common talk that $100,000 was paid for his release. A man in Kansas City, the owner of large drug stores, was taken into Kansas and held until his family paid $125,000. The State of Missouri was powerless to follow the kidnapers into the adjoining State. I could go on and mention many others.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I am in favor of capital punishment in connection with this crime. The House bill carries capital punishment, and I hope it will be carried in the bill when it passes the House, and that the House conferees will be able to get the Senate to agree to that section of the bill. If it is impossible to get capital punishment, then I will accept the Senate bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. I ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that some States do not have capital punishment, and when these kidnapers carry a victim into those States and murder the victim is not this the only way we can reach them and punish them by capital punishment?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Absolutely. This is the only way you can reach them and punish them properly.

Mr. GARBER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. GARBER. I am in sympathy with the gentleman's insistence upon the prosecution of criminals. Was this bill submitted to the Department of Justice?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. This bill was submitted to the Department of Justice, and despite the fact that the Attorney General had his attention called to the fact that the Congress of the United States has provided for the apprehension of men who take automobiles across State lines and men who take women across a State line for immoral purposes, he refused to support the bill because he stated it might be an added financial burden upon his department. I was amazed at his objection. I can not yet realize how he could make such a recommendation. Suppose the Bureau of Internal Revenue had not gone after the leading gangsters in the country. Would they have been apprehended by the States? The power to regulate commerce vested by the Constitution in the Government prevents the State from going beyond the State line. Therefore I say it is the the duty of the Congress to provide ways and means for Department of Justice agents to cooperate with the States.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER].

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Judiciary Committee, I am in favor of this bill, on the condition, however, that the provision for the death penalty be stricken out. If the object of punishment is vengeance or personal hatred or personal venom, as was exemplified by the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] a moment ago, I would say leave in the death penalty. I would put in the whipping post, and I would put in the thumbscrew and all the tortures and rigors of the Inquisition; but that is not the modern conception of punishment. It is the barbarous, savage idea of punishment. We want to deter and prevent other people from committing like crimes and at the same time reform the criminal. If what the gentleman from Texas said were true, let him go to Siam and be a representative there, where they revenge and feed their victims to crocodiles, or let him go to some parts of China, where they trample the prisoners under the feet of elephants. He, like Darius the Mede, would throw the prisoner to the lions. We are not in that kind of a barbarous state. We are in the twentieth century, and we must show some enlightenment. I am not, mind you, for treating defendants or the guilty in Pollyanna fashion. But I do want to inject some ideas of enlightened civilization in our criminal jurisprudence. "The criminal must be made to suffer" should not be our sole aim in punishment; if it should be, our aim at all is open to doubt. At all events, we can no longer act on the theory that society wants revenge. Suppression and prevention of crime is never brought about by revenge. On the contrary, revenge increases and begets more crime. The Hebrew prophet says, "Have I any pleasure at all that the wicked should die?" The important thing is certainty, not severity, of punishment. Swift justice will do the trick—nothing else.

It is interesting to note that in the 48 States only 6 States—Alabama, Illinois, Kentucky, Missouri, Texas, and Virginia—have a law making kidnaping for ransom a capital offense. The remaining States provide varying periods of imprisonment. There must be wisdom in these 42 other States. If 42 States, in the wisdom of their legislatures, have indicated that kidnaping for ransom should not be a capital offense, there must be some merit in their contention, and we should pause in our deliberations here before prescribing the death penalty.

If you insist upon the death penalty, I wager that you will inflict a penalty on the victim who is kidnaped. The victim may be murdered or slain because the prisoner has nothing to gain by the victim being kept alive, because he forfeits his own life, in any event. He may destroy the life of the very person who is kidnaped and whom you are trying to save. The person kidnaped is the witness who, even when rescued, can always point the accusing finger at the guilty. Doing away with the victim would save the life of the guilty. We must be careful, gentlemen. We must be realists, and not let our feelings get the better of us.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. Does the gentleman believe in the infliction of the death penalty for any offense?

Mr. CELLER. I shall reserve my remarks on that subject for some other time. I want to confine myself to the pending proposition.

In England, for example, they used to make pickpocketing a capital offense, and N. F. Cantor, of the University of Buffalo, a well-known author on the subject of crime, says this:

> The public executions were attended by thousands of people, but so many pockets of those attending executions of pickpockets were picked that the public executions were abandoned. Later most of the capital offenses were also repealed without the expected increase in crime. Furthermore, at a time when England had 200 capital crimes, the commission of felonies increased.

Certainly severity of punishment did not prevent recurrence of crimes.

I may repeat, gentlemen, it is not the severity of the punishment that will deter; it is the certainty of punishment. If you inject certainty into your criminal procedure you would not have any Lindbergh cases. When you go to England you find there a high sense of justice on the part of all the people.

We have not that high sense of justice in this country and we have miscarriages of justice; we have failure on the part of juries to convict; perjury is rampant; our third-degree methods are abominable. Justice is on perpetual holiday. Our laws provide sufficient severity—there is no certainty of conviction and punishment.

Certainty of punishment accounts for England's lower homicide rate. When punishment is too severe the punishment is often not inflicted. Juries will hesitate to return a verdict, for example, in kidnaping, condemning the defendant to death.

It is strange, but true, that relatively few convicted murderers are put to death in the United States. In practically all our States, for example, murder is a capital offense. Yet most of those who commit homicides in our States go unwhipped of justice or escape execution. The following table shows the number of homicides committed in certain States in 1924 and the number of executions, the executions occurring in 1925:

State	Number of homicides committed	Number of executions
Indiana	223	2
Maryland	119	1
New York	596	15
Ohio	422	13
Pennsylvania	571	20

Every once in a while the lust for revenge reaches the surface. It is so in the Lindbergh case—which, by the way, seems not to be a kidnaping case but rather a case of murder, and New Jersey, where the crime was committed, has the penalty of death for murder, yet the crime was not prevented. Society looks for a victim. It calls for the blood of the guilty. It is so in a Leopold-Loeb trial in Chicago or a Snyder-Judd trial in New York.

> The criminal becomes the scapegoat whom we sacrifice in atonement for our own criminal proclivities. Our self-esteem is preserved by vicariously punishing those who are apprehended. Our "guilty complex" is compensated for by projecting our impulses upon the few and punishing them.

[Applause.]

Let us not prescribe death. Rather let us provide imprisonment for life or for a long term of years.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER].

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, this legislation, of course, as everyone knows, has for its purpose making sure, so far as the Federal Government is concerned, the apprehending and punishment of those who participate in kidnaping.

I do not believe the Members of the House desire to enact this legislation other than for the purpose of punishing kidnapers who kidnap for ransom. I do not believe it is intended or desired to include punishment for kidnaping in cases where a mother or a father has taken a child away where there has been a divorce, or something of that kind. I hope an amendment providing for this will be included in the bill.

I disagree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] when he states that we should not provide the death penalty. The object or purpose of this legislation is purely to deter kidnaping. The States have been pretty well able in all other respects to take care of this crime, and this is for the purpose of providing a death penalty because a number of States do not provide such a penalty in kidnaping cases, and I would like to ask the gentleman whether or not he would be in favor of the death penalty for the kidnapers of the Lindbergh baby. Take the cases where somebody has been kidnaped and killed or murdered. Do you say they should not be punished with the death penalty?

If we did not have this provision in the bill, Mr. Speaker, the legislation would not be worth anything, because every State now has a kidnaping law and few of them provide the death penalty.

It is foolish to enact legislation to deter kidnaping and not make it punishable by death. What would happen in the case of the kidnaping of the Lindbergh baby, if they could be shown to be the ones that did it? We would have no law probably in the State where the prosecution occurred, and none in Federal law, if this bill should leave out the death penalty they richly deserve.

What would be the result? Nothing more nor less than the uprising of the people, and you would have probably a repetition of what we have had in this country many times—lynching.

Let us provide laws that will give the punishment that is deserved by those guilty of this horrible offense, where they have kidnaped and death results.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation originated in the city which I in part represent. In that city officers of the chamber of commerce, the mayor, the chief of police, and others got together, organized a committee for the purpose of trying to secure legislation upon this subject. They selected a representative—former Representative Cleveland Newton—to come on here and call the matter to the attention of Congress.

The committee in St. Louis drafted a bill, which they thought would cover the subject, and sent one to Senator PATTERSON, of Missouri, and the other to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN], to introduce in each body of Congress.

This was done, and the Judiciary Committee of the House has given the subject very long and careful consideration. I am in favor of this bill, if you will pass it with teeth in it and provide the death penalty. I do not think we should go beyond the regular practice in the enactment of Federal statutes.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I do not favor the principle in the bill of the committee as to giving away by the Federal Government to the States the apprehension on the part of the Government of kidnapers. In other words, Mr. Speaker, this legislation, if enacted into law, should be along the same lines other legislation that has been enacted, and of which we have had more or less knowledge in the past.

In other words, I do not favor the Government's releasing its responsibility in the enforcement of the law. We have a Bureau of Investigation and a large number of special agents of that bureau who are running down offenders against the Federal statutes, and this will not make any more expense. The Attorney General says that the cost of the enforcement of this statute will be nominal. We should leave this to the Federal Government and the Federal officials.

Mr. SPARKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. SPARKS. I concur in what the gentleman said a moment ago in relation to giving State officers the right to apprehend parties who are supposed to have committed this crime. The gentleman said he was opposed to that amendment. Is it not a fact that under the law now the United States marshals have the right to act only within their districts, and this would be giving the State officers greater authority than the United States marshals now have?

Mr. DYER. I do not know as the gentleman is cognizant of the amendment, but it says:

Provided, That all expense incident to such service shall be borne by the State where the kidnaping is alleged to have taken place.

Mr. Speaker, it will cause a lot of trouble between the States on the question of expense. It is unnecessary; the Federal Government has every agency for the enforcement of laws, and there is no need of going beyond it. If you do not want to enact a Federal statute to punish kidnapers, do not pass this bill; but if you are going to pass it, pass it as you have other Federal statutes, one that can be enforced. [Applause.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (S. 1525) forbidding the transportation of any person in interstate commerce, kidnaped or otherwise unlawfully detained, and making such act a felony.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 1525, with Mr. RAYBURN in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the first reading of the bill will be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I suggest perhaps it might be well for the gentleman from Texas to ask unanimous consent to consider the House bill as amended, as an original bill. It would save us the trouble of going from one section of the bill to a similar section in the other bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR. There is no occasion to do that now. When the bill is offered as an amendment that request could be made.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I am not familiar with parliamentary procedure, as every one knows. What the Committee on the Judiciary desires is to consider the House bill, but to take advantage of the fact that there is a similar Senate bill on the Speaker's table. I do not want my failure to make the proper motion at the proper time to interfere with what is the desire of the Committee on the Judiciary.

The CHAIRMAN. When the time comes for the reading of the bill, the Chair thinks it would be in order to move to strike out all of the Senate bill after the enacting clause, and substitute the House bill as an amendment.

Mr. MONTAGUE. And if we substitute the House bill, then that bill is open for discussion and amendment, is it not?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. In view of the fact that that is to be the procedure, I submit the further inquiry, in order to facilitate the debate, whether at this point by unanimous consent it would be in order to substitute the House bill for the Senate bill, in order that the language of the House bill may be more easily discussed in general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. That can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I make that request.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think that would not bring to issue the question of whether the form of punishment be life imprisonment or the death penalty. I think it is much better to bring the issue by the motion suggested of offering the House bill as a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE].

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, new legislation of this character, to lawyers who have a regard for the constitutional powers of the Republic and the constitutional powers of the State, naturally involves subjects of difficulty and responsibility. Whether the Federal Government should take jurisdiction of the crime provided for in this bill and which has been sustained and quickened by public sentiment, much of it righteous public sentiment, should first be decided. I think I may say without impropriety that the Committee on the Judiciary delayed reporting the measure until the young child in the Lindbergh case was found. There was contention as to whether we should provide life imprisonment or the death penalty, and there was apprehension that if the death penalty prevailed it would impose such fear and trepidation upon the criminals in the Lindbergh case that they would effectually conceal themselves or make their escape. Therefore, we rested on our oars until the progress of discovery or arrest took more definite form.

I was on the subcommittee that reported the bill of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN], with amendments mainly as to form and clarity. I still stand by the report of the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee. I think the amendments made by the House Committee on the Judiciary were mistakes, and I shall offer amendments at the proper time to correct these mistakes as I view them.

The first section of the bill is not materially different from the original bill except in the matter of punishment; that bill originally provided—that upon conviction the criminal should be punished by death or imprisonment in the penitentiary for such term of years as the court in its discretion shall determine.

That is the language of Federal procedure for time out of mind, giving the court the power to impose the penalties and the punishment, the juries the right to determine the guilt or innocence of the accused. The punishment in this case was to be either death or a term of imprisonment in the discretion of the court. If desirable to eliminate the death penalty, it is relevant to do it without involving any extraneous matter. The committee, however, brings in a substitute for that which I have read, namely:

That the accused shall, upon conviction, be punished by death, except when the jury in its verdict recommends mercy, in which case the punishment shall be imprisonment in the penitentiary for such term as the court in its discretion shall determine.

I submit to the committee that no such procedure is found in any prior Federal legislation, and why should we in this instance adopt an involved and new Federal practice? Is it wise? Will not the departure bring the practice into unnecessary confusion?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Virginia five additional minutes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. So I would like to see the original language restored when we reach the provision.

The second provision in the bill is wholly new. It relates to the enforcement of the law and is substantive in character.

Any person violating the provisions of this act may be arrested at any place in the United States by any peace officer of a State or subdivision thereof if designated by the governor of said State and appointed by the Department of Justice for such purpose.

At once this involves a deal of confusion and difficulty in administration. For example, there is a kidnaper; his arrest is urgent, and the officers in one State may not pursue him into another State. This amendment is offered to cure this difficulty. Therefore any peace officer of the State must be designated and subsequently appointed by the Department of Justice. There must be concurrent action of two officials, namely, the governor of the State and the attorney general. I submit that before this united action can be had the kidnaper will be gone.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I yield.

Mr. DYER. And the balance of that amendment provides that any expense incident to such service shall be borne by the State where the kidnaping is alleged to have taken place.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes. The gentleman made very strong observations on that a moment ago.

But I wish to submit that this action is impracticable of accomplishment.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. How did this punitive amendment get into the bill.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The Committee on the Judiciary put it in. I say that this provision will not facilitate or expedite the capture or arrest of the criminal. There are so much delay and so many obstacles put in the way of arrest that it will cause delay and confusion and futility.

Now, as Members of this House who have been here for some time know, I am very wary of conferring criminal jurisdiction upon the Federal Government unless it is necessary to effectuate powers already conferred in the Constitution.

I adopt Marshall's construction in this respect. But when the Federal Government undertakes anything in pursuance of its constitutional power it ought to do so without the concurrence of the State or its deterrent influence. The Federal Government should do it alone and not in cooperation with the States unless plainly necessary or desirable. To provide that the cost of administration shall be at State expense and that the officer shall be half Federal and half State will result in confusion and inefficiency, with the increased dominance of the very governmental power that the advocates of this section or provision wish to avoid.

Mr. SPARKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I yield.

Mr. SPARKS. Is it not a fact that some States have laws forbidding officers from being an officer of the United States Government and the State government, so that this would not be operative in some of the States?

Mr. MONTAGUE. That may be true, but I am not considering the details of the bill. Its salient features are sufficient to permit us to reach a conclusion one way or the other.

Now, with respect to the death penalty, the original bill provided for either the death penalty or imprisonment, in the discretion of the judge. The amended bill provides for death penalty unless there is recommendation for mercy by the jury. I submit that is wholly out of line with our Federal practice. If the Federal Government is to take charge of this crime, then it should do so in the accustomed Federal practice.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has again expired.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. As to the death penalty, I confess that my sensibilities were so distressed at the Lindbergh case that I would have consented to almost any sort of punishment. I am not a believer in the extension of punishment by death, but in cases contemplated by this bill I would make it alternative. I would make it either death or life imprisonment or as much imprisonment as the court may determine. In other words, I would stand by the old rule of the Federal courts in this particular. But rather than lose the original bill, or take it with all these various amendments, I would forego my convictions on the death penalty in order that we may have an act harmonious and consistent with Federal jurisdiction and our historical and uniform Federal practice. [Applause.]

Mr. COLLINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes; if I have the time.

Mr. COLLINS. If the persons who committed the crime against the Lindbergh child were apprehended, and if this statute had been in effect at that time, could those persons be punished under this statute?

Mr. MONTAGUE. No; not at all. The Lindbergh case—as far as Federal jurisdiction is concerned, the crime was in no way interstate; it was committed wholly within the State of New Jersey, and no Federal aspects whatever were presented.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It might have been conceived in and directed in another State.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Possibly; but I doubt it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has again expired.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, the consideration of this bill to-day presents an innovation in Federal criminal jurisprudence. Crime always keeps abreast of the times. Legislation does not. Whether on economic questions or on social welfare or on crime, legislation never keeps abreast of the times. It always lags. That is why some of us become so legislatively irritable and impatient and go beyond the pale of party regularity. Crime always keeps abreast of the times. As mechanics improve a lock, as inventive ingenuity devises an intricate safe, the criminal keeps abreast and sometimes one step ahead. Likewise with chemistry, explosives, firearms, transportation, and communication, crime makes use of every improvement.

The reason we are considering, and the reason there is necessity for considering, a bill of this kind is due to modern and rapid means of transportation and communication. Before we had the railroads, the automobile and automobile roads, wireless, telephones, and telegraphs each State could properly take care of its own crime situation. Why? Because crime was localized and escape was slow. It was impossible in the old days to escape local detection. But with the telephone, the radio, the automobile, and the airplane, particularly the automobile and the airplane, crime takes advantage of all available means of transportation, and not only is escape easy, but removal and disposition of loot, and the scattering of witnesses.

The criminal element understand the difficulty of interstate detection of crime and take advantage of it.

For instance, in a commercial zone like New York City we have wholesale crime, that is, crime in wholesale degree, like going into a loft and clearing out an entire establishment of furs or silks. Stealing by the carload has become an industry. Taking merchandise or whatever it may be in wholesale quantities into another State, taking away the original wrappers and putting on new wrappers is common practice. There is a regular market in this country for stolen property, not the loot that we used to think of, of the porch climber, but stolen property consisting of marketable merchandise. By reason of the easy means of transportation from one State to another and the difficulty of tracing, and the local cost in a community that has not suffered the loss, crime has grown, is organized and thriving.

The House passed a bill known as my stolen property bill last Congress, but it never passed the other body. This bill would not be before the House to-day were it not for the horror of the Lindbergh case, though the Committee on the Judiciary, if I may use the phrase, considered all these matters cold-bloodedly. The horror of the Lindbergh case had its effect and this bill was brought out, although, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] stated, it came to us long before that case broke. The chief of police of St. Louis and officers from Chicago were before us before the unspeakable crime of Hopewell was committed.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUFF. The gentleman does not mean that this proposed bill would prevent all interstate crime, does he?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No. I am showing the necessity of law to meet interstate crime. I am endeavoring to point out that States' rights and States' responsibilities are no longer applicable to the modern crime system confronting the country to-day. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF] has given the matter a great deal of study and introduced one of the first bills on control and punishment for interstate crime.

Mr. WOODRUFF. I am in entire sympathy and harmony with the gentleman on the subject.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I think it was one of the speakers under the rule who stated that very often police pursuing criminals find themselves led into what is known in police circles as "friendly territory"—friendly not to the police, but friendly to the criminal. Where a particular community suffers no loss there is no indignation or public opinion aroused against criminals and no desire to spend local funds for apprehension of criminals and trials for acts not committed in that community. They suffered no loss. So, although this may be a departure and what some may say an extension of the power of the Federal Government, nevertheless we will necessarily have to face it because crime is no longer local.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman, probably inadvertently, has fallen into a situation he might not be able to defend. What about prohibition enforcement across State lines?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is applicable.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In other words, the gentleman takes the position that the Federal Government ought to control the administration of criminal law in the case of violation of the prohibition statutes, and not leave it to the States?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am talking about crime, crime per se, natural crime, kidnaping, murder, assault, arson, burglary, robbery, rape, but not the natural fermentation provided by nature. [Laughter.] You can not make a crime out of something that is natural and not in itself wrong. When we shall have abolished that unnatural law we shall be relieved of spending so much money and effort in attempting to enforce an impossible and unnatural law. Then, we shall be better able to suppress real crime.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. CELLER. Is the gentleman in favor of including the death penalty?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. My colleague the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER], also a member of the committee, refers to the death penalty. My objection to the death penalty is perhaps different from that of other Members. I do not object to the death penalty as a matter of sentiment. My objection to the death penalty is practical. I find, and any man who has any experience in the prosecution of crime finds, that the death penalty very often acts as deterrent on the jury in bringing in a conviction of guilty. That is my objection to it.

The objection to the death penalty as provided in this bill, as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] points out, is because it is contrary to the Federal system of criminal practice. That being so, I would sooner make the penalty imprisonment of from 10 years to life. Of course, if the victim is murdered, then the prosecution is for murder, not for kidnaping.

Now, to get back to this question of interstate crime, I want to point out that I believe this is only one of a series of bills on criminal law which we shall have to consider. [Applause.]

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SPARKS].

Mr. SPARKS. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of legislation of this kind.

I am not in favor of the bill as reported by the House Judiciary Committee. I am opposed to taking rights away from the States, so far as criminal laws are concerned, and centralizing them in the Federal Government. However, in my judgment, this is a crime that is different from many of the other crimes.

The testimony before the Judiciary Committee shows that those who are guilty of kidnaping go into a great many States and that for the successful apprehension of those who are guilty of this offense it is necessary that they be followed up very quickly; and as the State officers have no right to pursue beyond the State border those charged with crimes or those guilty of this offense, they find it is difficult to apprehend them. Some of the officers testified that if they had had the assistance of Federal officers and had been given the right to quickly pursue those who were guilty of crime, that the guilty parties might have been quickly apprehended.

I do not think, though, that the amendment contained in this bill should be adopted, because it confers upon State officers, peace officers, greater authority than the marshals now have.

Under the law the marshals have no right to make arrests except within their own districts, so that this would be conferring upon those peace officers double responsibility, one for their State and one for the Nation, the Federal Government.

As I understand it, the constitutions of some of the States prohibit officers from occupying a dual capacity. Perhaps if they should accept a position under this bill, should it become a law, they might relinquish their State position. I do not think this amendment should be adopted in conferring these greater rights and greater privileges upon peace officers of the States than is now conferred upon our own Federal officers.

It is necessary, then, to have this legislation because of the fact that it is necessary to give the Federal Government the right to quickly pursue and apprehend those who are guilty of this offense, and it can not be successfully done unless such authority is conferred under the Federal Government.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. GARBER].

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Chairman, there are three questions involved in the presentation of this bill. First, the matter of policy; second, the penalty; and third, the administration; in all three of which I think the bill violates the essentials of good government and its administration. The gentleman from New York presented an argument which led him into a cul de sac, the reductio ad absurdum that the Federal Government should proceed in the prosecution of all felonies in the several States. These disciples of Jefferson, who have been rendering lip service year in and year out upon every occasion from every platform for State rights and about the necessity of preserving the sovereignty of the several States, should practice what they preach.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARBER. I yield.

Mr. CELLER. Not all gentlemen on this side feel that way about it.

Mr. GARBER. Of course, there are a few exceptions even on that side, and I am pleased to note the distinguished gentleman from New York is one of them.

Mr. BARTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARBER. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BARTON. Does this bill, if passed, take any of the jurisdiction away from the States? In other words, could not a State go ahead and punish the kidnapers just the same?

Mr. GARBER. Yes; that is true, but the Federal Government proceeds to pursue and prosecute crime in the several States, and that policy is wrong. I think the gentlemen who have continuously championed the cause of State rights upon the hustings should stand up in the well of this House once in a while and defend their position.

What single case has been brought to the attention of the members of this committee that necessitates the invasion contemplated by this bill?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield for one question, which is a question that disturbed us?

Mr. GARBER. I yield.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The gentleman spoke of State matters. When a person commits a crime like kidnaping in one State and takes his victim across into another State, does it not involve the policy of Federal rights?

Mr. GARBER. It involves, in the first instance, the sovereignty of the State, and the comity and cooperation of the several States have been found sufficient for apprehension and return for prosecution.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARBER. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The gentleman asked what cases have been brought to the attention of the committee that warranted the reporting of this bill?

Mr. GARBER. For which there was no remedy in existing law.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. If the gentleman will read the hearings and read the testimony of business men and police officials of Chicago, New York, Boston, St. Louis, and other cities, he will soon find that there is absolutely no remedy in existing law to take care of the things which this bill seeks to take care of.

Mr. GARBER. I would prefer an intelligent source for such information. The Department of Justice has withheld its approval of this bill. The National Bar Association, one of the best informed, most progressive, and most dependable organizations in reference to modern jurisprudence, has never requested such legislation or even suggested it.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Does the gentleman insist that the Congress of the United States should wait until the American Bar Association acts?

Mr. GARBER. Oh, no.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I explained the objection of the Attorney General. It was based solely upon expenditures.

Mr. GARBER. I am satisfied the Attorney General would not base his refusal upon mere expense, if such a bill were necessary in order to prosecute crime and uphold the laws of the United States.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. If the gentleman will read the letter written by the Attorney General, he will find it confirms my statement.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman three additional minutes.

Mr. GARBER. The policy is wrong. The second proposition is the death penalty. Recent events have not thrust this into the legal forum. A hundred years of experience is behind us. Forty-two States through that experience have concluded that the death penalty is not a sufficient deterrent of crime for its justification. It is uneconomic as well as un-Christian.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARBER. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The State of Missouri, my own State, having had some experience, repealed the death penalty, but it was only a couple of years before the legislature put it back on the statute books of the State.

Mr. GARBER. And crimes are still committed in the State of Missouri. There are 42 States that have discarded the death penalty.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARBER. Yes.

Mr. CELLER. Missouri, however, makes a distinction. It divides kidnaping into three classes, child stealing, kidnaping for ransom, and ordinary kidnaping. In the case of child stealing it provides imprisonment for not more than 20 years; kidnaping without ransom, imprisonment for not more than 10 years, and only in the case of kidnaping for ransom do they provide for the death penalty.

Mr. GARBER. There is no distinction made in the bill.

Mr. MONTAGUE. This bill only applies to kidnaping.

Mr. GARBER. The gentleman from New York insisted that modern conditions and machinations demand a general invasion by the Federal Government. Such is headline and not his usual good sense. The modern penalty is imprisonment at hard labor, with the net proceeds distributed to those made dependent by reason of the commission of the crime. The modern economic disposition is to repair the loss. Third, as to the administration, which has been so well presented by the distinguished gentleman from Virginia. You have a United States marshal in every State, with his experienced deputies distributed throughout the State. If you are going to insist upon this bill, why not clothe him and his deputies with authority so that they may proceed at once in the apprehension of the guilty?

Section 2 of the bill provides that only "any peace officer of a State or subdivision thereof, if designated by the governor of said State, and appointed by the Department of Justice for such purpose, may proceed to arrest and apprehend the person committing the crime." Instead of such limitation upon officials authorized to pursue and apprehend, the bill should confer such authority upon all responsible officials, both Federal and State, and without the requirement of designation by the governor and appointment by the Department of Justice. Instead of facilitating the successful pursuit and apprehension of criminals, such provision by delay in designation and appointment would facilitate their escape. [Applause.]

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, we have the exhibition here of a bill passing a committee practically unanimously, as I thought, and the only expressions heard on the floor of the House are expressions of opposition to provisions of the bill.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Wait a minute. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] opposed the bill as a member of the subcommittee in the full committee.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The gentleman knows that his bill only received a majority of one in the committee when the vote was taken.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. No; that is not my recollection.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is my recollection.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. There is no minority report. I do not want to raise any row about this. In our committee we get on pretty well.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am not making any issue of it, either.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Now, this is the situation: This bill was pending for a good while before the committee and no action was taken until the Lindbergh case, and then not so long as there was possibility to recover the baby alive. The bill was submitted to the Attorney General. The Attorney General objected to the bill on two grounds; one was the new expense and the other was he stated in his letter of opposition, "The enactment of such legislation had a bad effect on State authorities, as State authorities are inclined immediately to shift the burden onto the Federal authority where the Federal Government assumes jurisdiction."

I believe the observation of every Member of Congress sustains this conclusion of the Attorney General. The committee, however, did recognize the difficulties in the situation that was stated by the gentleman from New York, namely, that the ease of transportation and the rapidity of transportation from State to State has presented a new problem.

This brings us face to face with the question, In what direction shall we move? As the gentleman from New York stated, and stated correctly, if his view holds, this bill is only one of the kind that shall be presented to the Congress extending Federal power. I do not believe anybody who is familiar with the trends of thought and the trend of urging can fail to recognize that this is true.

We are either going to have to proceed according to the plan of this bill, giving to selected members of the State constabulary powers to pursue beyond State lines, or we are going to have to proceed according to the plan of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] and have the Federal Government take over the suppression of crime, and there is not any use of anybody trying to dodge it. We are at the point of decision.

It can not be disputed that the criminal can quickly go from State to State; that the States are unable themselves, under their present restraint, properly to deal with the criminal of a certain sort. The Federal Government can do it; but it is as true as gospel, just as the Attorney General has stated, when the Federal Government enters the field the State government steps out. We are developing on the one hand a great Federal bureaucracy that is not susceptible of popular control, and on the other hand a group of States absolutely becoming more impotent, becoming more and more governmental vassals to the great Federal organization.

There is one universal law everywhere operating. When you quit using the power you have nature takes that power from you. There is not a bit of use of anybody going around here complaining about the Federal Government becoming bureaucratic, when the total of Government power concentrated here is beyond the capacity of any governmental organization functioning under popular control. This is but one agency we can have to take care of the overload being poured in upon the Federal Government, and that is bureaucracy. There is no use to hope for a citizenship capable of maintaining a free Government unless they meet the difficulty that comes in God Almighty's good providence to challenge them to make the effort that may give them more strength; and there is no hope if, under these circumstances, we decline the issue, decline to fight, and turn to a great Federal organization to do the job for us. We have through the last section of the bill sought to leave as much responsibility as possible with the States for the suppression of kidnaping.

Prior to this bill we passed bills permitting States to enter into cooperative agreements to aid each other in the enforcement of other laws. When this bill was being considered chiefs of police told us they were confronted, when they came to deal with the crimes, with the fact they can not cross a State border. They told us, if they could cross a State border, arrest the culprits, and bring back the witnesses, they could deal with this crime. That is all they asked for.

Now, what did we do? We undertook to provide an extraterritorial jurisdiction, properly guarded, for State constabulary. To-day we do not observe State lines except in one or two instances. One is that when a criminal is being pursued the State line is thrown up in the face of the officer. We have undertaken to provide that members of the State constabulary, selected by the governor of the State and approved by the Attorney General, may make arrests, and so forth, in kidnaping cases. Instead of duplicating machinery, instead of letting the States step out of the picture, we provided the machinery under which the State can stay in the picture and still bring these criminals back.

The argument that it was not done this way 100 years ago is no answer to this plan, my distinguished friend from Virginia to the contrary notwithstanding. I have much respect for precedents, but because a thing has always been done in a certain way is not conclusive that it must always be done that way; when the oxcart has gone and the flying machine has come and the automobile has come, we have to modify even the machinery and methods of government.

God gives to each generation the challenge of necessity which it must meet on the responsibility of its own judgment. We have now come face to face with a situation where crime is organized and criminals go quickly back and forth across the State lines. That is a thing that you and I must meet upon the responsibility of our best judgment.

Never was there a truer gospel than the language of the Attorney General, when he said that when the Federal Government steps in the State steps out. There is not a man on the floor of this House who does not know that fact.

We have written the bill so that the State can not step out. We have written the bill so that members of the State constabulary, approved by the governor and approved by the Federal Government, can go across a State line, under a warrant from the Federal court and bring back the kidnaper for prosecution in the Federal court. That puts the Federal Government into the picture as little as possible and keeps the State governments in power in responsibility and footing the bills.

Do you tell me that that is not worth a trial? Is there a man who professes to love his State government, who is not willing to make that trial? I say to my friend from Oklahoma, for whom I have great respect, if you love your State you must help keep the State in a condition where it can deal with modern conveyances, the automobile and the flying machine, and how can you do it better than as provided by this bill, which permits the State officers to go across the State line and bring the criminal back? Section 2 of the bill, as I am certain it will be adopted, will read as follows:

Any person violating any of the provisions of this act may be arrested in any place in the United States by any peace officer of the State where the kidnaping is alleged to have taken place, or a subdivision thereof, if designated by the governor of said State and appointed by the Department of Justice: Provided, That all expenses incident to such service shall be borne by the State where the kidnaping is alleged to have taken place, except that of the trial in the Federal courts.

I have done the best I could to explain this section of the bill. As I view it we all consider the preservation of the State. Are we going to permit the States to waste away and shrivel up through nonexercise of its powers? We are destroying the States. The American people running around bragging about being free people, when they are more and more coming to be governed from Washington by an appointed personnel whom they direct and can not discharge. We have to recognize modern conditions, we have to recognize that we no longer travel by an oxcart, but we must not go the way toward Federal concentration merely because it is the easy way.

The great big job which we have is to develop a statesmanship and a citizenship capable of dealing with our modern problems without destroying the State as the responsible agency of free government. We must do this and still be able to meet the new conditions developed by the automobiles and flying machines. In the name of patriotism and love of your country, let us not surrender without an effort to these difficulties and scrap our State governments. Let us not surrender to a dire prediction of failure. [Applause.] Let us try to save our State, and try it now.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] is right as he can be, when he prophesies that this proposed legislation is the forerunner of more propositions of its kind, because nobody can say that the State is able to deal now with modern problems incident to the rapid method of transportation. The Federal Government must help to broaden the power of State constabulary or shove the States out of the way and assume responsibility.

If we can work out a system under which the Federal Government can give extraterritorial powers to State officers under Federal approval we will have a chance to save the important arrangement of powers marked out by those whom we love to call the fathers of this country. [Applause.]

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. HOCH. I would be interested to hear the gentleman discuss section 2, in so far as the preservation of the rights of the States is concerned.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. HOCH. I follow the gentleman part way, but perhaps not as far as I would like to. I can understand how we may attempt to give these extraterritorial powers to the State officers in making arrests, in apprehending the criminal, but after the criminal has been arrested I understand that he is to be tried in a Federal court.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. HOCH. For violation of the Federal act.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. That is correct.

Mr. HOCH. It would seem to me the question of whether he is tried in a Federal court for a violation of the Federal act is really the important thing here.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. HOCH. Rather than being tried in a State court.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Let me explain that. The only basis for the exercise of the powers we seek to have exercised by the Federal agency is that we make transportation across a State line a Federal offense. We did not believe it would be safe to undertake to lay jurisdiction in a State court.

Mr. HOCH. That seems rather an anomalous situation.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes; it is anomalous.

Mr. HOCH. A terrible crime has been committed, we will say. The person who is kidnaped is taken across the State line. This bill does not have anything to do with the kidnaping itself.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. That is correct. It has no power.

Mr. HOCH. Transportation across the State line is the sole crime covered by this bill.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. That is correct.

Mr. HOCH. While I am inclined to follow the gentleman, that seems to be going a good way, especially with reference to the conspiracy provisions.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. What would the gentleman do about it?

Mr. HOCH. I am inclined to think because of these new conditions that we will have to do something of that sort, but I do not see that the making of a State officer a mere Federal official or quasi Federal official is going to have anything to do with it.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. We have a very limited number of Federal officials. We have State police, municipal police—all sorts of police officers under the State organization. We have tried to avoid the expense incident to a duplication of police officers which would be necessary if these State officers may not be used; besides, their use would retain in the States a greater share of responsibility.

Mr. HOCH. Then this State officer is merely a Federal officer for the moment. Why do we propose to levy the expense upon the State, unless the criminal is going to be tried for a violation of State law?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. This is why. A citizen of a State has been kidnaped. The interest of the State is to capture the kidnaper. The police officers who came before the Committee on the Judiciary said that their trouble was in not being able to pursue the criminal. We have met the requirements of the State officers, leaving as much responsibility and as much power as we could with the State officers we thought to be in line with sound public policy.

Mr. HOCH. I could understand that, if after being apprehended the criminal is to be tried under the State law.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. How could you do it?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the warrant under the law which the gentleman is advocating have to be taken out in a Federal court?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Why deprive the State courts of jurisdiction to issue a warrant?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. This is a Federal offense. The bill makes it a Federal offense, or there would be no extraterritorial jurisdiction.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I thought you were merely giving Federal authority to State officials to cross State lines.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. We thought we could not do that otherwise than as provided in this bill.

Mr. DOMINICK. In that instance even if it were a Federal offense, the State would not be deprived of the right to try the offense in its own court, as it is now.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Not at all. May I say to the gentleman from Alabama, that as the difficulties were presented to us, the main difficulties lay in pursuit and capture. We felt that we would like to have the Federal Government supplement the State at its point of weakness, and this is the way we sought to do it.

Mr. COLLINS. All you have done, not considering what the gentleman has said, but merely on reading the bill, is to clothe the arresting officers in the States with Federal authority.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. May I make this statement? What we have done is this. Instead of going ahead and creating a great Federal constabulary sufficient to enforce the proposed Federal law, we sought to use the already constituted State constabulary or rather to aid the States wherein their jurisdiction is too limited, territorially. There are all sorts of State officers everywhere in the States. Why employ, why duplicate them with a lot of new Federal marshals. We did not think it good sense or economy.

Mr. COLLINS. It is to give to the arresting authorities who are State authorities the power to arrest for a violation of a Federal statute.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. That is right. In other words, we propose to use what the State has instead of duplicating the force and laying double expense on the backs of the people.

Mr. COLLINS. One other question. This statute deals with many offenses other than kidnaping.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. No; it does not.

Mr. COLLINS. Well, the bill reads "Persons who shall have been unlawfully inveigled, decoyed, enticed, seized, confined, kidnaped," and so forth.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I mean it is a kidnaping bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time, which I understand is six minutes, to the gentleman from New York [Mr. OLIVER].

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I am very much in favor of the bill. The only section I do not like is section 2. I do not like the section because of its wording. I am in favor of its principle. First, I do not believe we ought to ask the governors of States to appoint police officers. Police officers are appointed by various communities, and if the governor of a State is asked to appoint a police officer, he will be swamped with nothing but police appointments. That burden ought not be put on the governor.

Mr. HARLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of New York. I yield.

Mr. HARLAN. Is not the gentleman aware of the fact that in all extradition matters the governor must designate the particular police officer to make the apprehension and return, and this is simply a provision to escape the burdensome routine of going into extradition.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. I shall go into that subject later on just a little different line.

The governor appoints the man who goes to serve extradition papers, but he does not appoint men to go and search for the criminal; and when we appoint a man to search for a criminal, we are appointing a whole host of men.

Second, I do not believe that the State where the kidnaping took place should bear all the expense assumed by other States in searching for the kidnaper and in apprehending the kidnaper. How can we by Federal legislation say in the Lindbergh case, for instance, that all of the expenses of all of the States and of the Federal Government, for instance, shall be sent to the State of New Jersey? We by Federal statute can not do that. That is an impossibility. I do not want to establish a Federal police. I want to establish a State police with the power, provided they go into Federal courts for trial, to cross State boundaries and bring men into the Federal courts. I want them to have the right, secondly, to follow across State lines, when they do not know whether they should or not, because as the facts develop in each case the police officers are confronted with mystery. I want to see State lines not as obstacles, not as a great wall which must be scaled by the police officers and as a tunnel through which criminals might escape, but I want to have police officers with the right to follow across State lines everywhere in the hot pursuit of what they believe to be the trail of crime.

Mr. THATCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of New York. I yield.

Mr. THATCHER. I have not heard all of the discussion, but under the bill as drawn "in hot pursuit," is it intended that the State officer may cross a State line in actual pursuit of the kidnaper?

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Yes, sir. I intended to propose an amendment to section 2 that carries out my idea a little better than the committee amendment carries it out.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of New York. I yield.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. The gentleman speaks of the expense that might be saddled upon the State in the pursuit of these criminals. This proviso would only apply to officers of the State itself, would it not, and would not apply to officers of another State who might be engaged in the pursuit?

Mr. OLIVER of New York. The bill states:

That all expense incident to such service shall be borne by the State where the kidnaping is alleged to have taken place.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. But that would only apply to the officers of that State, who have been appointed as quasi Federal officials?

Mr. OLIVER of New York. I am afraid it is ambiguous, but this is what I propose: First, that the appointment shall be made by Federal district attorneys, and that appointees shall be police chiefs, commissioners or sheriffs, if they consent. Then the police chiefs, commissioners, and sheriffs shall appoint some of their own subordinates as Federal police officers; that all shall be sworn in by notaries public. We want to get this away from governors and attorneys general. That those men shall have power simply to enforce this particular act and no other act. We are engaging police officers against kidnaping. It also provides that not a dollar from the Federal Treasury shall be paid in salary to these officers; that all of their expenses shall be borne by their local communities, except, of course, the expense incident to the actual trial. If the trial comes in the Federal court, naturally the Federal Government is in full control. Private people can not be supplying the Federal court with money or the State governments can not be supplying the Federal court with money for the purpose of trying these cases.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of New York. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman is a member of the committee. I was not present when section 2 was considered or embodied in the bill.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Neither was I.

Mr. MICHENER. Does that contemplate the setting up of a Federal police force, regardless of the commission of offenses? As I read it, it means that there would first have to be a kidnaping, and then after the kidnaping, those officers might be designated.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. No. I believe they would be designated before any kidnaping. They would be designated to-day and would serve in all cases of kidnaping. At least, that is my proposition.

Mr. MICHENER. Well, how many are contemplated?

Mr. OLIVER of New York. It does not make any difference. We want the entire police force of all States if we can get them, and as many as shall be appointed otherwise.

Mr. MICHENER. And constables?

Mr. OLIVER of New York. It makes no difference. A constable might be the most valuable man of all.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

All time has expired.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CELLER. I desire to offer an amendment relative to the death penalty, and I am uncertain at this point whether I may offer it directly after the enacting clause is read in the Senate bill, or must I wait until the House bill is substituted?

The CHAIRMAN. First comes the reading of the bill. Following that will come the committee amendment. The gentleman may offer his amendment after the committee amendment has been offered.

The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whoever shall knowingly transport or cause to be transported, or aid or abet in transporting, in interstate or foreign commerce, any person who shall have been unlawfully seized, confined, inveigled, decoyed, kidnaped, abducted, or carried away by any means whatsoever and held for ransom or reward shall, upon conviction, be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary for such term of years as the court, in its discretion, shall determine: Provided, That the term "interstate or foreign commerce" shall include transportation from one State, Territory, or the District of Columbia to another State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, or to a foreign country; or from a foreign country to any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia: Provided further, That if two or more persons enter into an agreement, confederation, or conspiracy to violate the provisions of the foregoing act and do any overt act toward carrying out such unlawful agreement, confederation, or conspiracy such person or persons shall be punished in like manner as hereinbefore provided by this act.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SUMNERS of Texas: Strike out all of the Senate bill after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That whoever shall knowingly transport or cause to be transported, or knowingly aids or abets in transporting in interstate or foreign commerce, any person who shall have been unlawfully inveigled, decoyed, enticed, seized, confined, kidnaped, abducted, or carried away by any means whatsoever and held for ransom or reward, or held for any other unlawful purpose, shall, upon conviction, be punished by death, except when the jury in its verdict recommends mercy, in which case the punishment shall be imprisonment in the penitentiary for such term as the court in its discretion shall determine: Provided, That the term "interstate or foreign commerce" shall include transportation from one State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, to another State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, or to a foreign country; or from a foreign country to any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia: Provided further, That any person convicted of violating the foregoing act may be punished in any district in or through which such person or persons so unlawfully inveigled, decoyed, enticed, seized, confined, kidnaped, abducted, or carried away, has been transported, removed, or confined: Provided further, That if two or more persons enter into an agreement, confederation, or conspiracy to violate the provisions of the foregoing act, and do any overt act toward carrying out such unlawful agreement, confederation, or conspiracy, such person or persons shall be punished in like manner as hereinbefore provided by this act.

"SEC. 2. Any person violating the provisions of this act may be arrested at any place in the United States by any peace officer of a State or subdivision thereof if designated by the governor of said State and appointed by the Department of Justice for such purpose: Provided, That all expense incident to such service shall be borne by the State where the kidnaping is alleged to have taken place."

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CELLER: Page 2, line 3, strike out line 3 and line 4 down to and not including the word "imprisonment."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the Clerk kindly read the language that is proposed to be stricken out?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the language stricken out.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Death, except when the jury in its verdict recommends mercy, in which case the punishment shall be.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, this amendment, in a word, will strike out the death penalty.

We may have made great progress, exemplified as the speaker has stated, in the airplane, the radio, and the automobile. New crimes may have been developed, but I say that our criminal procedure is still in the ox-cart days. We have made little or no advancement in our criminal jurisprudence. You have but to read a few pages of the Wickersham report to find that out, or to read the reports of the many crime commissions appointed by various States to have that observation confirmed. We know that a trial in a criminal court to-day is nothing but a duel of wits and tricks between the prosecutor on one side and the attorney for the defense on the other side. This state of affairs does not exist, for instance, in England, where there is a keen sense of justice. We have not a keen sense of justice in this country. Justice does not pervade the trials in our criminal courts.

Therefore I say, make the penalty as harsh as you will, yet you will not prevent kidnaping. Punishment must be certain to prevent crime. Severity does not prevent crime. Harsh penalties relative to murder in this country do not prevent and have never deterred murder. You have but to read the textbooks on this subject or the criminal statistics in the various States to learn this fact. But if punishment were swift and certain, you would successfully prevent crime of all sorts. The state, the low state, of our criminal procedure precludes swift and certain punishment.

We are still frontiersmen when it comes to criminal procedure. I say that we should not in the interest of deterring crime make the penalty so severe as to involve death. Death will not prevent kidnaping but will insure the death of the person kidnaped instead. Prohibition has done much to bring about bad conditions in our Federal and State courts.

Inflicting, for example, those harsh penalties, as embodied in the Jones "5 and 10" bill, has caused subornation of perjury and miscarriage of justice, and refusal of jurors to convict. Perjury is rampant throughout the country and all sorts of venality exists in the courts. Change your criminal procedure if you will, but do not make these penalties so harsh as to prevent juries from bringing in verdicts of guilty. That is what you will do if you keep this death penalty with reference to kidnaping. Do not be swayed by the Lindbergh case. We lawyers know that bad cases always make for bad laws, and you have a bad law here as the result of the hysteria, passion, and prejudice that have been fanned into flame by the Lindbergh case.

I hope, gentlemen, that by sober judgment, and that by the light of reason, and not by your emotions, you will judge this matter. Do not inflict the death penalty upon kidnaping, and then, and only then will you be satisfying the inherent purposes of punishment, namely, to reform the defendant and at the same time prevent the recurrence of the crime.

Mr. SWING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. Yes.

Mr. SWING. If the gentleman's amendment is adopted, will he be willing to offer a minimum for imprisonment later on?

Mr. CELLER. I would have no objection to that, but this would leave it to the discretion of the court. My amendment provides that these criminals shall—

Be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary for such term as the court in its discretion shall determine.

Mr. SWING. Such imprisonment might be one hour or one day. I think it would be more persuasive if the gentleman would make it 10 years to life imprisonment. If that were done, I think many of the Members would be willing to vote for the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. CELLER. I would be happy to accept an amendment of that character.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Is not the bill in this status: A motion made by the gentleman from Texas that the House bill be considered as a substitute for the Senate bill? Is not that the motion?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the situation.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Has that been adopted?

The CHAIRMAN. It has not.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Then was not the gentleman from New York premature in offering his amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. No; for the simple reason that if the substitute is adopted then no amendments could be offered to it. The substitute is now pending and open to amendment.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, let us see just where we are with regard to this amendment. It seems to me the argument of my colleague on the committee is not practical. When you come to examine the bill you find it provides that the death penalty may not be inflicted by the judge unless the jury itself has in effect inflicted the death penalty. So there could be nothing that would deter the jury from inflicting, in effect, the death penalty in a particular case. Let us get that straight. So that argument, with all due respect to my colleague from New York, falls, because there is nothing for it to rest upon.

The next question comes whether or not you are going to leave it to the jury which has heard all of the evidence in the case to pass upon the death penalty, if the jury believes the death penalty ought to be inflicted. From my four years' experience as prosecutor, I testify that there is nothing on earth that is such a deterrent to those who are criminally inclined as the possibility of having the thing wound up, no escape, no pardon, death the end.

I want to direct attention to another thing. We have been making some progress in this country in some regards but we have been slipping in some regards. That strong, sturdy attitude of the American people, whose faces were set against the criminal and who met death with death, is being wiped out by a lot of maudlin sentiment which is responsible for the gangsters and murders like that of the Lindbergh baby. [Applause.]

We must develop a generation of men and women with red blood in their veins, who, before God Almighty, give their sympathy to the defenseless, to the children of this land, and let the gangsters know that if they dye their hands in innocent blood there is in this country a manhood and womanhood who will take their lives, and that when we do take their lives we will be taking the lives of dirty dogs. [Applause.] We have had enough sobbing over this lot of people. There is nothing on earth that will put the fear of God in them like the knowledge that the death penalty is in the hands of a people who have the courage to inflict it. I would rather have the little Lindbergh baby walking the earth to-day than to have every gangster walking around seeing whose child he could steal. I have sympathy, but I have sympathy for the people who are willing to lead a decent, honest life. What we need in this country is some wholesale killings. If we could take 500 here and 250 there and line them up against the wall and shoot them [applause], then honest men would not be afraid to go home at night and would not be afraid to leave their women and children to walk the streets in what is supposed to be free America.

Just the other day we were strutting around here pulling off centennial celebrations and bragging about Washington and our ancestors wearing rags, and so forth, listening to orations about the land of the free and the home of the brave, and we were afraid to go home that night after the show was over. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. HOCH. Does the gentleman know whether death is the penalty for kidnaping in the State of New Jersey?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I do not; but I know it ought to be.

Mr. HOCH. There certainly is the death penalty for murder, and murder was committed; and yet the penalty did not deter the murderer in that case.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I know they are hard to catch and hard to convict, but when we do get them let us finish the job. We will have one less to feed. Rather than feed the murderer of a child, I would rather take that food and give it to another little child rather than to put the murderer behind walls for honest people to feed during all the days of his dirty life. [Applause.]

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that such a pro forma amendment would be an amendment in the third degree.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri may proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York seems very much disturbed about the death penalty. I want to ask the gentleman why the State of New York has a death penalty, and I would like to ask him why the State of New York has a law which provides that a man may be sent to the penitentiary for life if convicted of a second or third offense? I would like to ask him why it is that the great city of New York boasts that for the number of people contained within its borders it has less crime than any community in the United States?

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. CELLER. My State has no death penalty for kidnaping.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. But it has the death penalty for murder, and I have heard the gentleman maintain on the floor of this House that by reason of the laws of his State they have less crime in the State of New York, taking into consideration its size, than any community in the country. The gentleman will not deny that. It is the penalty that lessens crime in New York.

Men schooled in the detection of crime appeared before the Judiciary Committee and some of their testimony was even given behind closed doors. They told the committee in open session that the men who practice kidnaping are afraid of Uncle Sam, or as the criminals characterize Uncle Sam, they are afraid of "Old Whiskers." Put "Old Whiskers" into the business of preventing kidnaping and you are going to stop this lowest of crimes.

I am in favor of the death penalty, but if necessary to get a Federal law I will accept life imprisonment.

I am not in favor of that part of the amendment adopted by the committee which reads, "Except when the jury in its verdict recommends mercy, in which case the punishment shall be imprisonment in the penitentiary." If I have my way, I shall strike out that language and make the crime punishable by death or imprisonment in the penitentiary, as the court in its discretion shall determine.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understand the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] in case the amendment of the gentleman from New York is voted down, will offer an amendment to carry out the very purpose the gentleman has expressed.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Then I shall support the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia.

Ladies and gentlemen, I say to you, do not weaken this bill. I realize the position taken by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS]. He is sincere in his efforts to limit Federal police powers, but this is to meet an emergency. We need this law to insure protection to men, women, and even children. The mothers of the country want it. Will you deny their children protection? Who is it that will not listen to a mother?

I say this crime has progressed to such an extent that it is the duty of the Congress to stamp it out, and you can stamp it out with this law.

I do not think section 2 of the committee amendment has any place in the bill. If we can pass a law giving the Federal Government jurisdiction where a man steals an automobile, without requiring the governor of a State to appoint, with the approval of the Department of Justice, a police officer to go to an adjoining State, I see no reason why we can not pass a law giving the Government jurisdiction when some individual steals a person and takes him across a State line, when the State officials in that community where the crime is committed have no jurisdiction to follow. We can give the power to the Federal Government in such a case to go across the State line and apprehend the criminal. It is our duty to do so.

Mr. McGUGIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. McGUGIN. What is the penalty for kidnaping in the State of Missouri?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Death.

Mr. McGUGIN. Can the gentleman give us any information as to the penalty for kidnaping in most of the States of the Union?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER], I believe, a few moments ago said there were six States in the Union that provide that the crime of kidnaping is punishable by death. As to the gentleman's own State, a few weeks ago they took a lady from Kansas City, Mo., over into Kansas and held her for ransom; and as I told the committee at the outset of the debate on this bill, the man who perpetrated that crime was brought back from South Africa by the State authorities of Missouri and was sent to the penitentiary for life only yesterday. Six of his companions are already in the penitentiary, and two more await trial.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Did you ever execute anyone in this gentleman's State for kidnaping?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Not that I know of.

Mr. Chairman, as the members of the Judiciary Committee will agree, I have cooperated with them throughout the consideration of this bill. Naturally, they have their views, and I was willing to go along if the House would agree to their amendments and send the bill to conference, but it is becoming evident that the House committee amendments are going to be opposed by some members of that committee.

While I introduced the House bill, I want it to be known that I have no pride in authorship at this moment. What I want is to obtain the objective, and I am willing to go along and strike out the death penalty; in fact, I will be perfectly willing, if it be the pleasure of the committee, to pass the Senate bill as it came to the House, so that it will go to the President for his signature.

I am so convinced of the necessity for this law that I will make any personal sacrifice as to authorship to insure final enactment at this session. I do not want it tied up in conference. The junior Senator from Missouri, Mr. PATTERSON, is the author of the Senate bill, and we have worked together since last December for this legislation. What I want is a law of this character now, and that is what I will strive for.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DYER to the amendment offered by Mr. SUMNERS of Texas: On page 2, in line 1, strike out the words "or held for any other unlawful purpose."

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I think these words are in here by error because I remember distinctly that the subcommittee, of which the gentleman from Virginia is chairman and I am a member, recommended to the full committee that these words be stricken out; and it is my recollection that the full committee agreed to it.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman states that the words are in here inadvertently. My colleague suggests that this matter was discussed in the committee, and there was some discussion on the Lindbergh baby kidnaping, and that this language was left in to cover a situation of that kind.

Mr. DYER. There is no doubt but that the words ought not to be in. I will tell you why: In a good many kidnaping cases the father or the mother of a child, the parents being divorced, goes and takes possession of the child when the court has put it in the custody of the other parent.

I remember 25 years ago, when I was prosecuting as a State's attorney in St. Louis, a case of that kind. There is not anybody who would want to send a parent to the penitentiary for taking possession of his or her own child, even though the order of the court was violated and it was a technical kidnaping. What we are trying to do is to provide the severest punishment for people who kidnap and carry off people from one State to another for ransom, for money.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. It is my understanding that this language was put in the bill for the purpose of preventing some one kidnaping a person, taking him to another jurisdiction, who might, if present, appear as a witness in court to convict some one who would be liable to be guilty of kidnaping for ransom. I think the gentleman is going to weaken the bill by insisting on his amendment.

Mr. DYER. There are statutes for punishing such a thing as suggested by the gentleman from Missouri.

If somebody kidnaps or carries off an important witness in a criminal case to prevent him from testifying, he is guilty of a State crime, and there is no necessity of making it a Federal offense.

If you want to enact a law for kidnaping, enact one and let us have the death penalty in it. I do not care what England does about this, we are legislating for the American people, and I think we are capable of doing it without taking lessons from England or any other country. [Applause.]

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. Yes.

Mr. FISH. What would happen in case of a husband and wife living apart or divorced, and one of them kidnaps the child?

Mr. DYER. There is a punishment for that.

Mr. FISH. Would that come under this bill?

Mr. DYER. It would, if you leave this language in it. In Missouri a number of years ago I prosecuted a man for going to St. Louis and taking his little son and carrying him off to California. The child had been awarded to the mother. He was charged with kidnaping under the State law of Missouri, and we brought him back and prosecuted him. We gave him a punishment of a year in jail and a fine. But you can not couple up a matter of that kind with this bill, if you want to enact it, for punishing kidnaping for ransom.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MONTAGUE: Page 2, beginning in line 3, after the word "death," strike out the comma and insert the word "or"; strike out the remainder of line 3 and all of line 4 down to and including the word "be."

Mr. STAFFORD. So that it will read?

The Clerk read as follows:

So that it will read:

"Held for ransom or reward, shall, upon conviction, be punished by death or imprisonment in the penitentiary for such term as the court in its discretion shall determine."

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, this subject has been somewhat discussed by me heretofore. The word "death" is retained, so that I shall not discuss that. This is an effort to restore the original language of the bill, giving the power to the court to impose the punishment, not to determine the guilt. That is left just as it was in the original bill. The jury is given the power to convict and the court to impose the punishment provided by law—be that punishment imprisonment or death. That is the obvious result of the amendment I have offered, which is the original bill adopted by the Senate, and the original text reported by the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary to the Judiciary Committee. I do not see why we should encumber this statute with a new and unprecedented Federal procedure. Why not retain it in its Federal form? In some States, upon the recommendation of the jury, it is provided that the court shall do so and so or that the court shall not do so and so. I submit it is better practice, it is the sounder view, it is the simpler view, it is the simplest in point of administration to have your Federal courts do here in this act what and as they have done in all former acts. We should preserve the symmetry and continuity of our Federal practice. Let it be the duty of the jury to find the guilt or innocence of the prisoner, and of the court to determine the punishment as fixed by law. I submit the amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. DOMINICK. Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] has stated, possibly this is a new procedure in so far as the Federal courts are concerned. The same can be said of the entire bill which is before us. It is all a new procedure. But in so far as the practice is concerned, it is not a new procedure. Many of our States have this exact term in their statutes which carry capital punishment, practically all of the States. For instance, when you come to the crime of murder, in some States it is within the right of the jury to bring in a verdict of guilty of murder in the first degree, which automatically carries the death penalty, and that penalty is fixed by the jury, by 12 men, and not by one judge. The jury may bring in a verdict of second-degree murder, in which case the punishment is either life imprisonment or a term of years, to be fixed by the court. This is as simple as it can be. If there is a case of such atrocity, or such heinousness, that the jury of 12 men believe should cause the infliction of the death penalty, they may fix it by their straight verdict of guilty, and not place the responsibility on just one man, the judge. It is very simple. The jury takes the case. It brings in its verdict. If it believes the death penalty should be inflicted it says guilty and stops. If it believes that a less penalty should be inflicted, it brings in a verdict of guilty with the recommendation of mercy, and then the judge fixes the penalty according to what he believes to be the proper punishment for the crime which has been committed.

I can see no objections whatsoever to it. I think if you are going to make this a crime, if we expect to strike terror into the minds of these people who are accustomed to commit this crime, if we expect this to be a deterrent, we should have a penalty that means something. If in a particular case there should be extenuating circumstances, if leniency should be exercised, you have it here under the terms of the bill, and I respectfully submit it is not an unusual procedure and will involve no unnecessary work on the courts.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOMINICK. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I did not mean to intimate an unusual procedure from the point of view of the gentleman. I submitted that the practice was not in consonance with Federal procedure, and perhaps it was unwise to have any procedure that does not conform to Federal practice, that our whole system should have symmetry, and that this is reached when the jury finds the verdict, and the judge inflicts the death penalty or imprisonment. I submit to my friend that the judge is about as likely to be right in that matter as is the jury.

Mr. DOMINICK. Whatever the language of the bill may be of course the court imposes the sentence, but as a matter of fact under the bill the jury fixes the sentence by bringing in a verdict of guilty without any recommendation to mercy.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOMINICK. I yield.

Mr. LINTHICUM. If there were extenuating circumstances, does the gentleman not think the jury would hesitate to bring in a verdict of guilty if it thought there might be a death penalty imposed? Does the gentleman not think the jury might hestitate?

Mr. DOMINICK. There is no doubt in the world about it. That is one reason why this provision was placed in the bill. It was placed there to try to prevent hung juries or mistrials, or to prevent a miscarriage of justice on account of the extreme death penalty that could be imposed under a verdict of guilty when there were extenuating circumstances.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. STAFFORD) there were—ayes 84, noes 23.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which is at the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TARVER: On page 2, in line 1, after the word "ransom," strike out the word "or" and insert a comma; and after the word "reward," insert the words "or revenge."

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] was adopted a few moments ago, by which the words "or held for any other unlawful purpose" were stricken from the bill. Judging by the vote on that amendment which occurred in the Committee of the Whole, there were certainly quite a few of the members of the committee who felt that kidnaping for some purposes other than those of ransom and reward should come within the terms of this act. Hypothetical cases were mentioned in the argument advanced in support of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri, where parents, separated from their children by reason of court decrees which did not permit them to have custody of them, might be guilty of kidnaping or taking possession of and transporting such children unlawfully, and be subject to the provisions of this act; or that other similar instances of offenses of this character certainly less heinous than kidnaping for reward, might come within its terms.

I think those were valid objections to the language which was originally put in the bill, but it occurs to me that kidnaping for revenge ought not be excluded by the committee from the penalties imposed by this act.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. Gladly.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman tell us some cases that this proposed amendment would cover? Can the gentleman give us an example of a case of kidnaping for revenge?

Mr. TARVER. As far as my section of the country is concerned, I am glad to be able to say that we are not very familiar with kidnaping cases, as they are not as numerous as they appear to be in the gentleman's State of Missouri.

Mr. DYER. We have a nest of kidnapers in St. Louis.

Mr. TARVER. Not many of those come within my knowledge, but I submit it requires very little imagination to conceive of cases where forcible seizure and transportation of persons might occur for revenge. As indicated by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] a short time ago, the kidnaping of the Lindbergh baby might have occurred for purposes of revenge, yet, under the terms of this act, with the gentleman's amendment adopted and with no further language in the bill, it would not have constituted a Federal offense even had the transportation been across State lines.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. I yield.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. If the word "revenge" is included, in accordance with the gentleman's amendment, it would become an element of proof. How would that be proved in a case? Would that not be rather difficult?

Mr. TARVER. Just as motive would be proved under many other laws. Where the element of malice is required, for instance, or that an act shall have been done wilfully or fraudulently; that the act under investigation by the jury was motivated by malice or by intent to defraud. It would be a question under this amendment for the jury to determine whether the question of revenge was the thing which motivated the perpetrator of the crime or not.

I see no objection to the amendment on account of the alleged difficulty to which the gentleman has just called attention.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. I yield.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I agree with the purpose of the gentleman's amendment, but I am wondering if the gentleman has examined into the question of the constitutional power to punish under the interstate commerce clause, where transportation is for revenge?

Mr. TARVER. Congress has undertaken to exercise constitutional powers to punish where transportation under the Mann Act is for immoral purposes. That is not necessarily a question of money or commerce. It has never been held to be. Why could they not exercise equal authority with reference to the seizure and transportation of individuals for purposes of revenge?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

I wish to call the attention of the House to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia. The purpose of course is desirable, but I fear it would weaken the bill instead of strengthening it. The moment we write into a criminal law a motive, in this instance that of revenge, it becomes necessarily an element of proof, and the burden of proof in a criminal prosecution being upon the State, it would make it extremely difficult to prove that element. Every element must be recited in the indictment and every detail of it must be proven.

The gentleman says "How would you prove malice?" In any unlawful act there is the presumption of malice, but here there is a state of mind, namely, that of revenge.

For instance, take abduction for immoral purposes. If it is sought to prosecute under the kidnaping act the incentive motive might not have anything to do with revenge.

Mr. TARVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. TARVER. Might it not be possible to charge in the indictment that the kidnaping was for either of the three purposes, ransom, reward, or revenge, and not be essential to prove that it was for more than one of these purposes?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. True. If the victim is not held for ransom or reward, I fear it would be difficult, if not impossible, to prove the element of revenge. I prefer the provision "other unlawful purpose" which this committee saw fit to strike from the bill.

Mr. TARVER. I am not talking about the technical language of an indictment. The gentleman understands my idea, that the Government could charge all three motives in such language that proof of any one would be sufficient to sustain the indictment.

Mr. MONTAGUE. They are all in the same category.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I agree with the gentleman that the approval of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri striking out "or held for any other unlawful purpose" weakens the bill. I think the State could show, perhaps, that the seizure was unlawful and the holding was unlawful and not necessarily for ransom and reward. I agree with the gentleman that it would have been better to have left that in.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The words "unlawful purpose."

Mr. TARVER. The words "unlawful purpose" have been stricken out.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. These words have been stricken out and we do not correct it by the gentleman's amendment putting in revenge, because it is almost an impossible element of proof.

Now, there may be many instances where the seizure is unlawful as described in the first part of section 1. There may be, as the gentleman from Georgia points out, kidnaping not inspired or motivated by reasons of reward and ransom—for instance the kidnaping of a prospective witness, the kidnaping of a person to prevent him from doing any act—which are all unlawful. However, I fear that putting into the bill the element of revenge will weaken it rather than strengthen it.

Mr. TARVER. That is what I would like the gentleman to explain, how it could possibly weaken the bill. It simply adds another motive which might inspire kidnaping and which might be held to be criminal under the provisions of this act. It does not eliminate anything. It does not eliminate either of the other motives referred to in the act, ransom or reward. How could it weaken the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Permit me to put it this way, then; it would serve no useful purpose.

Mr. TARVER. I think, many times it is possible to prove the motive of revenge.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I really believe it would have been better to have left in the language "or held for any other unlawful purpose." That would have covered any purpose which could be established as being unlawful; such purpose would have been brought within the provisions of the bill.

Mr. GOSS. I am not a lawyer, but I would like to call the gentleman's attention to line 6, which reads:

Who shall have been inveigled, decoyed, enticed, seized, confined, kidnaped, abducted, or carried away—

And then it states:

and held for ransom and reward.

As I understand it those things must be tied up.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have one additional minute to answer my question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In this instance the proof necessary to convict would be proof that the person was either inveigled, or decoyed, or enticed, or confined, or kidnaped, or abducted, or carried away; any one of those would be sufficient, with proof in addition, that he was held for ransom or reward.

Mr. GOSS. Then, all of them do not have to be proved in one case?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No; it is only necessary to prove one of the methods and the holding for ransom or reward.

Mr. GOSS. In other words, any one of the methods?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes; the method and the holding for ransom or reward.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. OLIVER of New York as a substitute for section 2 of the amendment offered by Mr. SUMNERS of Texas:

"Any Federal district attorney shall have the power to appoint as Federal police officers any police chief, commissioner, or sheriff who shall consent to said appointment and whose State, county, city, village, or town shall be wholly or partly within the prescribed boundaries of the district of said Federal attorney. Said police chiefs, commissioners, and sheriffs shall have power to appoint such of their subordinates as they shall designate as Federal police officers. Said officers shall receive no salary from the Federal Treasury, and oaths of office shall be sworn to before a notary public or other officer empowered by law to administer oaths.

"Such Federal police officers shall have power to enforce only the provisions of this act.

"All expenses of said officers shall be borne by the State, county, city, village, or town by which they were originally appointed, except such witness fees as would be paid to any witness summoned in any criminal case before the Federal courts or grand juries."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment is not germane to the bill or to the section to which it is offered. It provides for the appointment of new officials by district attorneys, in no way related, remotely or directly, to the purpose of the bill or anything necessary to carry out the purpose of the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, unless the Chair is ready to rule I want to state that I think the amendment is certainly germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Mr. Chairman, my only purpose in rising again is to call attention to what I stated a few moments ago. The proposition is to give some official the power to go all over the United States. No official can have that power except a Federal official. Unless we designate somebody as a Federal police officer he can not have that power, in my judgment.

States will not permit police officers of other States to enter except as citizens, and if they enter as citizens they must seek the support of the local police in order to make arrests and make inquiries.

Under the provisions of the amendment I propose that State officers shall be empowered to act as Federal police officers without salary and without a single charge being made for their service.

Mr. TARVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Yes.

Mr. TARVER. Is it not true that under the constitutions of many States an officer can not accept a commission as an officer of the Federal Government, so that the laws of many of the States would prevent an officer from acting in this capacity?

Mr. OLIVER of New York. That is correct, and there is no question about that. My only response to that is that those States that will permit their officers to act as Federal police officers should have the advantage of having them act in that way, and those States which do not permit it may be induced by the benefits which may result to change their laws or their constitutions. We should never establish a Federal police force under the supervision of the Federal Government unless it is a Federal police force controlled and owned by the State governments.

Mr. TARVER. Does the gentleman conceive that there is any greater necessity for a provision of this character relating to kidnaping than there is for such a provision relating to other Federal statutes, such as the Dyer Automobile Act, the Mann White Slave Act, and other statutes of that character? Why permit the designation of State peace officers as a sort of Federal constabulary to enforce this act only?

Mr. OLIVER of New York. As an answer to the gentleman's question, I say that we are now on the eve of the establishment of a great Federal police force. We are constantly adding to the police force of the Federal Government. In order that we may be able to check the grant of power to the Federal Government to establish a Federal police force we should check the establishment of a Federal police force under the control of political officials who will use this force not for the enforcement of laws but for political purposes, as is the case in Europe.

Mr. TARVER. But we are here proposing to establish a Federal police force and turn the State police force into a Federal constabulary for the enforcement of this particular act alone.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. For this particular act. I will stress that in connection with the merits of my proposition.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Does not the gentleman feel that the best way to carry out his idea would be to strike out section 2 entirely?

Mr. OLIVER of New York. No; I do not. You have got to give the Federal Government a police force to carry out the responsibility. The Attorney General actually asks for 180 men. If you should give the Federal Government the responsibility without giving it a police force, then you are perpetrating a fraud on the Government and you are only passing a fake statute. You have got to back it up by a Federal police force; and if you do not do that in clear-cut fashion, you will find the people of the States, now in turmoil over a Federal police force enforcing prohibition, rising up to strike down this kind of a police force if it is to be paid for out of the Federal Treasury and controlled as a political police force by the United States Government.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Does not the gentleman feel the crime warrants such action?

Mr. OLIVER of New York. I do not feel it warrants the overturning of the entire police control to the Nation. However, I believe the laws should be enforced, and I say give us Federal authority and give us State police clothed to exercise that Federal authority.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

I am certain if the Members would pause a minute to consider what the amendment offered by my colleague from New York would do, there would be no doubt about the committee voting the proposition down.

Just imagine giving into the hands of a local United States district attorney the power to appoint a flock of Federal agents and send them into another State. Surely there is nothing like that in existing law or custom to warrant any such policy. United States marshals can not appoint deputies at random and send them wild all over the country. There is no power that can do anything like this. I am sure that gentlemen on reflection will see that in their enthusiasm and desire of putting a tremendous force, such as is described, back of the purposes of this bill they are overstepping the mark.

If I may make one suggestion, and I do this to the author of the bill who has worked so hard on it, I would suggest that the best thing we could do would be to vote down the House bill and vote for the Senate bill as it is. Such action will finally pass the bill, and the bill would go to the President for signature.

I think the Senate bill is more concise, is clearer, and will serve the purpose in every way.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. So far as authorship of the bill is concerned, I care nothing about that. I desire to reach the objective which we have in mind.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I know that.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I have gone along with the committee and whatever is agreeable to the committee is agreeable to me. I want a bill of this character passed, and I do not care whether it is my bill or the bill of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. PATTERSON].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will say, in all fairness, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] has pioneered this proposition in Congress. He has brought it before us and I know that he was big enough and sufficiently interested and so sincerely interested in the proposition as to want to get the best available bill, which is the one he initiated and which was passed by the Senate and now before us. By voting down the substitute the Senate bill would be before us for final vote.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Let me ask the gentleman from New York a question. Are not the original bills offered by Mr. COCHRAN, and Mr. PATTERSON, of the Senate, identical?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Then, if the gentleman will look at the amendments made by the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee of the House and the bill as now passed by the Senate, he will find they are practically identical. So we do not gain much one way or the other.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does my colleague from Virginia agree with my proposition?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am not wholly desirous of taking from my colleague, who has worked so hard on this matter, all acknowledgment of his service in this connection, but I would certainly not defeat the bill for any such reason as that.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No one would suggest that; but if we are going to load a House bill with amendments, I think it would be better to enact the Senate bill as it is.

Mr. MONTAGUE. There is one thing you have here that is not in the Senate bill—the death penalty.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does not the gentleman believe that the Senate bill is concise and clear?

Mr. MONTAGUE. It is exactly as we reported it from the Judiciary Committee, with the exception of the death penalty.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Then, I should think the gentleman would favor my proposition.

Mr. MOORE of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. MOORE of Ohio. If the bill has to be returned to the Senate because the death-penalty provision is in the House bill and not in the Senate bill, this might lead to further controversy and endanger the passage of the bill.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Exactly. I will say to the gentlemen that if what Congress is looking for is a headline, leave the death penalty in; but if we are looking for a real bill that will be a deterrent to kidnaping, take the Senate bill. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. OLIVER].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WOODRUFF: Page 2, after line 22 of the amendment of Mr. SUMNERS of Texas, insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 2. Any person who shall go, or who shall persuade, induce, entice, or coerce, or cause to be persuaded, induced, enticed, or coerced, or aid or assist in persuading, inducing, or enticing, or coercing, any other person to go, in interstate or foreign commerce, from any place in any State or Territory of the United States, or in the District of Columbia, to any place in any other State, or to any other place in such Territory or District of Columbia, for the purpose of committing, or of aiding, abetting, or assisting in the commission of, or for the purpose of procuring, inducing, inciting, or coercing any other person or persons to commit, or to aid, abet, or assist in committing, in such other State or in such Territory or in the District of Columbia, any felony as defined by the laws of such other State or such Territory, or the District of Columbia, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and, on conviction thereof, if any murder shall have been committed as the result thereof within such other State or such Territory or the District of Columbia, shall be punished by death or by imprisonment for life, in the discretion of the court, otherwise by a fine of not more than $25,000 or by imprisonment of not more than 25 years, or both such fine and imprisonment."

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the proposed amendment. I shall reserve it for three minutes if the gentleman desires.

Mr. WOODRUFF. If the gentleman will reserve his point of order, I shall appreciate it.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, I realize fully that the amendment is subject to a point of order, and I shall not address myself to the point of order but rather to the amendment itself.

Mr. Chairman, I think everyone will agree that kidnaping is without question the most horrible, the most intolerable, the most despicable crime that can possibly be committed. I want it distinctly understood that I am for the bill that is now before the committee. There are, however, other despicable and horrible crimes committed almost daily by highly organized and highly financed criminals whose activities reach across State lines, and this confirms my opinion that this bill does not go far enough. I believe conditions have become such in this country, owing to matters which are familiar to all of us, in the way of increased and improved methods of transportation, that State authorities to-day can no longer cope with organized crime.

From the newspaper reports we see daily, it appears that these organized gangsters operate across State lines with both impunity and immunity. I picked up the Daily News of this city to-day and was rather shocked when I found there was no account on the first page of a murder committed by organized crime.

Turning over the page, however, I found there was a report of a murder which had been forced off of the front page by the account of the bonus-march demonstration at the Senate end of the Capitol to-day. The papers are and have been full of such reports and crime of every description is rampant throughout the country.

I have listened with great interest to the academic discussion of "State rights" this afternoon, but I am frank to say that I have not been greatly impressed thereby. It has always been my opinion that when the rights of a State interfere with the rights of all the other States, the rights of that State should be set aside. The right of the individual to do things abrogating or setting aside the rights of others is not recognized as between individuals and it should not be so recognized as between States.

I am not an attorney, I am not interested in the technicalities of law enforcement, but I most earnestly am interested in the enforcement of law.

It seems to me, and it must seem to every student of this question, that the States have become helpless to meet the demands for proper control of crime. State authorities have become helpless in this country against organized crime. Everywhere we read of bank robberies, and frequently in connection with that crime we find murder committed. Only in rare instances are these criminals brought to justice, and then only when the State authorities are fortunate enough to capture the criminals before they reach the State lines.

In the report of the committee there appears the following statement:

It has been represented to the Committee on the Judiciary by members of the constabulary of States where the crime of kidnaping is prevalent that when the person kidnaped is transported beyond the jurisdiction of the State where the kidnaping takes place such officers are handicapped in the detection, arrest, and punishment of those guilty of such kidnaping by the fact that they are prevented by the barrier of State lines from pursuing the kidnapers beyond their respective States, and have no power to call from another State witnesses to testify against persons charged with kidnaping.

Other criminals follow the same tactics the kidnapers follow. They know the State line spells safety for them, because the power and authority of the State in which the crime is committed ends at the border of that State.

Certainly this country needs to-day an arm of the law that is long enough and strong enough to reach into every nook and corner of the American possessions and bring the criminals of this country to justice. [Applause.] There is only one such authority in the country, and that is the Federal authority. It is ridiculous that if a criminal steals an automobile and takes it outside the State he can be apprehended and prosecuted by Federal officials, but if he commits murder, robbery, kidnaping, or any other crime he is free to come and go at will so far as the Federal authorities are concerned.

I wish my friend from Texas would withdraw his point of order against this amendment and that it be incorporated in the bill. It would make available every law-enforcement agency in the land for this war on organized crime. Apparently nothing less will answer.

The amendment I have offered is House bill 490, that has been before the Judiciary Committee for two years. I introduced it in the Seventy-first Congress and I have introduced it in this. Illinois and other States have been helpless against the Al Capones of gangdom, but the United States Government has put them in the Federal penitentiary. Not for the more serious crimes they have committed, but for falsifying their income-tax returns and for their bootlegging activities, these being the only crimes for which they could be held responsible by the Federal authorities.

This bill carries every authority for Federal intervention when the States are either unable or unwilling to function in these matters. It should become the law and that without delay. There is a war going on between organized crime and organized society. It is time the latter brought up its shock troops and put the common enemy to rout. This bill will point the way.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, and the gentleman from Texas makes the point of order against it that it is not germane. The bill provides for punishment of the one crime of kidnaping. The amendment of the gentleman from Michigan opens practically the whole range of felonies. Therefore, the Chair thinks it is not germane, and sustains the point of order.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to the bill.

Page 2, beginning at line 23, strike out section 2.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a perfecting amendment to the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman may offer it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. SUMNERS of Texas:

Page 2, line 25, after the word "State" insert the words "where the kidnaping is alleged to have been committed."

On page 3, line 4, after the word "place" insert the words "except the expense incident to the trials under this act."

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I hope these amendments will be agreed to, regardless of what you propose to do with regard to the amendment of my colleague from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE]. As a matter of fact, according to my recollection, and I do not believe I can be mistaken about it, this language was agreed to in the committee. It was not the purpose of the committee to shift to the State the expense of the trial in the Federal court. I am sure that is correct; I believe the members of my committee will bear me out on that. So, regardless of what you propose to do with respect to the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, I hope you will agree to these amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendments offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out section 2. It is not in the Senate bill, it was not in the original House bill considered by the subcommittee. It was adopted by the Judiciary Committee, as my friend the chairman says. I was not present when it was adopted. I asked to be recorded against it before I left, because I contemplated there might come some such measure as this, from the conversation that developed in the committee. The committee very kindly agreed to so record me.

This is unnecessary legislation. It is complicated and will be difficult to enforce. It provides for the appointment, by the Federal Government in cooperation with the State government, of certain additional officers whose cooperation it would be difficult to secure or administer unless we subject the country to enormous expense, and without a swarm of officials it is difficult to make it effective. For example, a kidnaping has been committed in a State. The criminals go to another State. Where is your officer to make the arrest? You may have two or three such officials in the northern part of the State, but the criminals are in the southern part of the State. Where can an officer be secured in time? The criminal will be in another State before you bring the officials into action.

It reminds me, if you will permit me to narrate an anecdote, of the failure of electric bells in a town to sound the alarm upon the outbreak of a fire. They were defective, and when they were tested they did not ring. So the mayor of the town very solemnly came before the town council the next day and submitted an ordinance requiring the alarm bells to be sounded 15 minutes in advance of any fire. [Laughter.] That is about the situation here, unless you are going to have the law administered by a swarm of officials, girding the boundary lines of our States. I submit as a matter of practical administration we should omit this section, which in the very nature of things imposes such unworkable conditions.

One word more. It has been suggested by my good friend from Michigan that he is not concerned about the subject of State jurisdiction or Federal jurisdiction there. Most lawyers who deal with subjects of this sort, whether they want to be concerned about it or not, have to be concerned; but I shall not argue that further than to observe that we should go very slowly with this sort of law. But when we do go, if you have Federal jurisdiction, let the Federal power operate within the Federal jurisdiction. If you can get State cooperation on a matter of actual arrest, do so.

Nobody is going to stop anybody from helping to make these arrests. You will have no trouble in any State in impeding a Federal officer in trying to secure a posse comitatis to help him make that arrest. It can be effective without any expense or at least a very limited expense.

As to the crime itself, we all have agreed that this is a crime of great magnitude. It is one of such peculiar nature that it is assuming, in conjunction with modern economic and social development, great growth. With the growth of these agencies, economic and social, this character of crime is likely to take on great proportions. We have been threatened recently where governments, State and National, have practically stood powerless and asked the help of the criminal world—one of the most shocking and humiliating spectacles ever known to threaten our governments or our civilization.

Therefore, I think the growth of the Federal power in this particular field is inevitable. Being inevitable, I would not clothe it with a too-complicated set of regulations or rules. Let this law be enforced as any other law of the Federal Government is enforced. We enacted no supplementary laws aiding Federal or State officials in enforcing the white slave act or the automobile act or any other Federal act. The law itself supports its execution as it now stands; and if on development it appears that we do not have sufficient administrative power to do it, we can amend the law that will give the remedy power. I think it is unwise to travel too far at this time. [Applause.]

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I recognize the difficulty of having any new plan seriously considered. An old plan ought not to be lightly put aside, but our old plan is going to be put aside; we must either strengthen the powers of the States in dealing with crime or they must fade from the picture. I have great respect for my colleague from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE]. I am going to begin at the conclusion of his suggestion, whether I am mistaken or not as to the method, I know we are at the parting of the ways. We are going to confront in this vote perhaps as serious a question, so far as policy is concerned, as has confronted the statesmen of America since the organization of the Government. We have to recognize that the States fail by reason of their inability to cross State lines.

My colleague from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] says that when a crime of this sort is committed, the Federal officer may be at the upper end of the State, whereas the crime may be committed in the lower end of the State. That is true. Now, what is the practical thing to do? Is it sensible to have a lot of perfectly competent State officers down there at the State border, where the crime is committed, and where a man is escaping with a kidnaped child, unable to cross the State line, with the Federal official, the only one who could cross the line, 200 miles away? What is the horse-sense thing to do? We propose in this bill to let the governor select some picked people from State officers scattered over the State, and submit his selections to the Attorney General, who is responsible for the general enforcement of Federal laws, and clothe them with the power to arrest for the violation of the Federal law proposed to be created by this act. That Federal officer and State officer would have agreed as to the people who can be trusted with this responsibility, and empower them, so that when a crime is committed, to follow the criminal and bring him back to justice. After his return, if the case is filed in the Federal court, the Federal Government would prosecute that case like any other case. There is not a line in this bill that prevents any Federal agency now in existence from exercising all the powers which it possesses in following those guilty of kidnaping. There is not a line in the bill about that.

What do we propose to do? We propose to supplement the State constabulary and do the ordinary, common-sense thing—pick out some men whom the governor will agree to and whom the Attorney General will agree to. Let them be scattered all over the State so that when a Federal crime, kidnaping, is committed, they do not have to wait a day and a half for a Federal marshal to come to the community but there would be somebody right there who can take up the trail and the State would have to foot the bill. That is an important feature of this section.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. LINTHICUM. It seems to me that the difference between the gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from Virginia is that the gentleman from Texas contemplates making these appointments in advance, whereas the gentleman from Virginia seems to think the appointments will not be made until the crime is committed.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. There is no limitation or specification, and how many would be appointed I do not know.

Mr. MONTAGUE. We ought to know.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Well, I do not know. The State governor would have to select them and the State would have to pay them.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I submit to my friend, who agrees with me so much as to the creating of national power, that under the gentleman's scheme, to make it successful, we would have to flood the State with an army.

Mr. DYER. Everybody will be a Federal official.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. No. They will not be Federal officials and everybody knows they will not be Federal officials. They will be the present police officers and sheriffs and their States, cities, or counties would have to pay them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. They will be elected officers or appointed chiefs of police and sheriffs; appointed or elected by the people where the children are kidnaped. Who is any better judge than they are of the man they want to trail these criminals? When we are elected to Congress we immediately develop a superiority complex. We think we are smarter than anybody on earth. I am willing to risk the selection of these men to the people who elect the sheriff in the county, for instance. I am willing that they should designate the men they would be willing to have preserve order and follow those who had molested the sanctity of childhood in that community. I would at least be willing to give them half a chance. Then we have an additional check against undeserving people that is imposed by the provisions of the law, which provides that even after the people have chosen the men, the Attorney General must agree. How much more do you want done to have everybody protected? Do you want kidnaping in this country? Then leave the enforcement of this law to the United States marshal who is 200 miles up in the country trying to find somebody who has violated the Federal prohibition law, or some other Federal law, or would you not prefer to have the chiefs of police and the sheriffs clothed with the power which this bill proposes to give them, to take hot after the man with the child? I can see no sense in refusing to allow the people who want to stop kidnaping, appoint the policeman or the marshal to help pursue, to help detect, to help arrest. Every agency which the Federal Government has can be used. What is the common sense in not letting a sheriff follow across a State line and bring back the child who perhaps has been stolen from the first block in the street from where he lived? As much as I love my friend, the gentleman from Virginia, and I do love him, I think he has done in this instance as I do in many instances; I think he has taken the wrong trail.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last five words.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending.

Mr. STAFFORD. But that is a preferential motion. The motion pending before the committee is to strike out the entire section. I move to strike out a part of it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wisconsin may have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas is pending.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wisconsin may be allowed to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York, that the gentleman from Wisconsin be allowed to proceed for five minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, if I understand the mechanics of enforcement advocated by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, we would have singled out in every State, as special enforcement officers, every police officer, or at least certain police officers and certain sheriffs, all selected by the governor and approved by the Attorney General, for the sole purpose of using their badge of authority when a kidnaping case has occurred. Now, if kidnaping was an occurrence that was happening frequently and where the jurisdiction was likely to be exercised every day in the year, there might be some horse sense, if I may use the phrase of the gentleman from Texas, to that proposal; but I am opposed to specially appointed police officers, with a badge of authority that they can go around and say, "I have been selected by the governor of the State and approved by the Attorney General of the United States for the sole purpose that when a kidnaping case occurs in my State, I may go anywhere to sleuth the case."

We have in my State special deputy sheriffs who have certain duties, which are very limited. Many seek these nominal posts largely to display their badge of authority. What strikes me in this proposal of the distinguished gentleman is that for an occurrence of kidnaping that may not occur in a State once in 10 years he is going to have a constabulary established, an especially constituted and appointed constabulary, which will be ready as minutemen to go across the border of the State when that condition arises. That strikes my horse sense as really approaching a travesty on the enforcement of justice.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Will not the gentleman help us and let us try it out and see?

Mr. STAFFORD. No; for if we do it in this instance, we will be called upon to do it in more instances.

As the distinguished gentleman from Virginia has told you, we have had for years the Mann White Slave Act. In fact, I was on the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce at the time that bill was reported, many years ago. It has been rigidly enforced, and there has been no instance where the national officers have not coped with the situation, and the local police officials have cooperated with the Federal officials in enforcing the act.

I have kept an open mind, and until the gentleman concluded his speech I listened very attentively. The establishment of a great army of self-appointed men designated by the governor and approved by the Attorney General, to say, when a kidnaping case occurs in my State, I am specially constituted to go across the border, approaches the ridiculous, with all due respect to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. WHITE. How long does the gentleman think it is between kidnapings in the city of Detroit?

Mr. STAFFORD. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. WHITE. Does the gentleman think 10 years intervene between kidnapings in the city of Detroit?

Mr. STAFFORD. Kidnapings in the city of Detroit have not been very frequent. In Milwaukee, because of our rigorous police regulations, we have no kidnapings.

Mr. WHITE. How often do kidnapings occur in Chicago?

Mr. STAFFORD. Nor do we in Milwaukee need Federal assistance to cope with the criminals of Chicago who cross the border line of our State and come to Milwaukee. We are able to cope with this condition through our efficient police system.

Mr. WHITE. The gentleman knows there are a great many cities where crime is not handled as effectively as it is in his virtuous city. Should not they have this benefit?

Mr. STAFFORD. My city for long has had an efficient, honest, police force, and now it violates the very fundamental principle of police regulation, or of government, to hold the people of the localities to a strict accounting of their own government and not shift that responsibility on strangers.

Mr. WHITE. There is a kidnaping in these cities every two or three days.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am fairly well acquainted with local conditions both at Detroit and Chicago, and I must insist that the gentleman is greatly magnifying the evils when he makes that extravagant statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SUMNERS of Texas) there were—ayes 68, noes 16.

So, the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] as amended.

The amendment as amended was rejected.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Was the vote just taken on the substitute to the Senate bill?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Therefore the Senate bill is now before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Just a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman from New York finished his parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No. As a member of the committee, I ask for recognition.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask recognition and I thought I had been recognized to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York desire to offer an amendment?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. I desire to offer an amendment and have asked recognition for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks amendments are in order. Therefore the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Alabama to make a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. As I understand, the Senate bill has not been read for amendment, the first section of the Senate bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Senate bill has been read.

Mr. DOMINICK. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DOMINICK. Mr. Chairman, I am a member of the committee and have been seeking recognition to offer an amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. I did not yield for any such parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a parliamentary inquiry. The Chair will state to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DOMINICK] that the Chair did not see the gentleman, who is a member, asking for recognition. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment: Before the word "imprisonment," in the sixth line, insert the words "death or."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 1 of the Senate engrossed bill, line 8, after the word "by," insert the words "death or."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, we are now considering the Senate bill. The Senate bill only made provision for imprisonment while the House bill provided for death or imprisonment. This amendment, if adopted, will conform to the action of the committee and will make the bill the same as that voted upon by the committee. My amendment brings the original Cochran bill before the committee for determination.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Did the Senate bill originally contain the death penalty?

Mr. STAFFORD. It did not, but the House bill did. I am offering the amendment in order to conform to all of the arguments made here to-day and make this bill conform to the original Cochran bill.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. While I am in favor of the death penalty, I do not want to lose this bill and as the Senate committee absolutely refused to put the death penalty in the Senate bill, I am afraid if we put in the death penalty and send the bill to conference, it will stay in conference for a long period. I want the law and, if necessary, will agree to eliminate the death penalty.

Mr. STAFFORD. Through my amendment I am attempting to carry out what I believe is the thought of 90 per cent of this Chamber, namely, that we shall provide for death or imprisonment. We acted upon that in the committee and I am merely trying to carry that out. I am in favor of that and other Members have expressed themselves as being in favor of the death penalty or imprisonment, leaving the determination of the sentence to the judge.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I did not hear the gentleman's amendment but I have listened to his argument. Am I correct in believing that in offering this amendment the gentleman is attempting to conform to the amendment which the committee adopted heretofore?

Mr. STAFFORD. My amendment not only conforms to the bill as originally introduced by the gentleman from Missouri but it also conforms to the action taken by the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. CELLER. Does the gentleman know that the original House bill as it came out of committee provided that imprisonment should be in the discretion of the jury and not in the discretion of the judge?

Mr. STAFFORD. We have eliminated that and I am trying to make the Senate bill conform to the action of the Committee of the Whole as taken this afternoon.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. DYER. I wish to join with my colleague [Mr. COCHRAN], the author of the bill, and beg the gentleman from Wisconsin to withdraw his amendment and let us vote upon the Senate bill now so it can go to the President and we will have a real act of Congress that will deter kidnaping. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. This committee, after considering this bill for three hours, has decided in favor of the death penalty or imprisonment, the sentence to be determined by the judge. I am now going to leave it to the action of the Committee of the Whole and let the committee determine whether they want a bill which will have teeth in it or whether they want to strike out the death penalty. I am trying by my amendment to carry out the determination of this committee. That is all my amendment means and it will read as follows:

Held for ransom or reward shall, upon conviction, be punished by death or imprisonment in the penitentiary for such term of years as the court, in its discretion, shall determine.

If you wish to conform to the judgment of the committee and if you wish to provide for the death penalty, you will vote for my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina desire recognition?

Mr. DOMINICK. I desired recognition in order to offer an amendment similar to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. We had the same difficulty in the committee. This committee by its vote just now in refusing to substitute the House bill has expressed itself in favor of the provisions of the Senate bill. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN], who has worked hard and patiently on this proposition, appeals to the committee to take the Senate bill as it is written in order to avoid this bill going into conference and incur the danger of not becoming law.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I can say to the gentleman that I was informed by members of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate that the bill would never have been reported out by the Senate committee unless the death penalty was eliminated. Therefore, I fear, if the bill goes to conference it is going to remain in conference, and for that reason I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin will be defeated. I dislike to give in on the death penalty, but it appears necessary to me that we do so if we are to get this law.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The country is awaiting legislation of this kind. The Senate bill is clear, concise, artistically drawn and, I believe, serves every purpose.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman spoke with reference to the sentiment of the country. If I know anything about it—and I may not—I believe the country wants the death penalty imposed for kidnaping.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will say to the gentleman from Alabama that we are confronted with a parliamentary situation. We are at the end of the session. We have a great number of bills in conference, and it is going to do us no good, as I said before, to legislate for the purpose of a headline and send the bill to conference where it will be deadlocked.

Many States have no death penalty even for murder—very few States have death penalty for kidnaping. As far as I have been able to ascertain no one has been executed for kidnaping—even in States that have a death penalty for the crime. What we want is a Federal law with teeth in it to meet the situation of interstate kidnaping. Such a bill, as it now stands, is before us, and I urge its approval—without any amendment.

Here you have the author of the bill, here you have the friends of the proposition to put this interstate crime under proper Federal control, and I make this appeal to the House. You have heard this bill discussed from every angle. You have heard every viewpoint. Let us take the Senate bill. It is well drawn. Let us pass the Senate bill to-day. It will go to the President and will become law. That is the thing to do.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, to my mind this whole legislation is a piece of hysterical legislation. It arises out of one crime that is destined to become a classic in this country. The more we read about the crime the more it seems to be one of murder and not of kidnaping. Federal officers have been working on this crime. Federal officers have not solved the situation, and yet we add another crime to those on the Federal statute books. We give another power to the Federal Government. We again contravene State rights in order to put an end to kidnaping, and the bill will not do that, because the use of Federal officers in the one so-called kidnaping case has not solved that crime.

The bill is bad enough in adding this crime to the Federal statute books with its strong punishment, with its discretionary power of punishment, a thing unheard of in America, with its death penalty. Is the death penalty going to stop kidnaping? Look into the operations of the criminal mind and you will find it is not going to stop kidnaping. It is going to add to the murders of the country because the kidnaper is afraid of one man. He is afraid of the victim. It is the victim who can send him to the death chair. It is the victim who will be killed, not the kidnaper. If we insist on the death penalty staying in the bill, there is not a chance in the world of a victim ever being restored to his folks or ever being restored to his friends. They will trick the friends. They will take ransom from the friends and then do away with the victim, because it is the victim who can go on the witness stand in a court of justice and point his finger at the criminals and send them to the death chair. Are they going to the death chair when they can save themselves from the death chair by killing the victim? This very piece of legislation, this very absurd extreme penalty shows why we have so much crime in this country. It is because the organized criminals seem to have a keener sense of what to do in a situation than the legislators and the law-enforcement officers.

I say leave this to the local enforcement officers, the efficient police forces in the cities. They can run down criminals. They have run down kidnapers. The Federal Government is not a bit more efficient than the local officials, and by no means in America at this time should we add another Federal crime with a death penalty attached to it.

I think this is an outrageous proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. If there are no further amendments, under the rule the committee automatically rises.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. RAYBURN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the committee having had under consideration the bill (S. 1525) forbidding the transportation of any person or persons in interstate or foreign commerce, kidnaped, or otherwise unlawfully detained, and making such act a felony, pursuant to House Resolution 250, he reported the same back to the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule the previous question is ordered on the bill to final passage.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The text which the House has before it is the bill (S. 1525). The bill contains certain wording stricken out and then there are certain provisions written in italics. Am I correct that the matter in italics is the bill before the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What is before the House is the engrossed Senate bill.

Mr. DYER. And that does not contain the part that was stricken out.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The engrossed bill does not contain the part shown as stricken out in the bill as reported to the Senate.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LETTER TO A CONSTITUENT

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein a letter I have written to one of my constituents.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate very much the courtesy of the House in granting me permission to print a copy of a letter that I have addressed to one of my constituents, Mr. C. H. Fawks, Snyder, Okla.

DEAR FRIEND: I have just received a telegram stating that the records of the State of Oklahoma show that one Neil Gardner put his wife on the State pay roll when superintendent of the State institution at Pryor, Okla. This is the same person who has yelled loud and long against me for putting my wife on my pay roll during the time I was in bad health. Holy gee! What a demagogue.

In answer to the unjust, unfair, and untruthful attack made on me relative to my wife, May McClintic, being on my pay roll, I want to say that I have never made any statements to the contrary, but on the other hand have said that she was on the pay roll during the time I was in bad health. I said in my first speech that during the World War, when I worked night and day trying to help the soldiers and their dependents, I was stricken with influenza which resulted in an operation that caused tubes to be placed in my left lung for drainage, which brought about a bad condition to the extent that the injury is permanent. This evidently resulted in a weakening of my kidneys, and in 1929 a major operation was performed and the left kidney removed. During this period I have been in hospitals four times and have had four operations. The last one was performed at Mayo's, in Rochester, Minn., in 1930.

For the reason I had to be away from my office a portion of the time it was necessary that I have some one looking after my duties that had my interest at heart, so I put my wife's name on my pay roll in order that the money could be used to take care of extra help. This is authorized by law, and is the method used by many Members of Congress. Therefore, I have no apology to make to anyone for doing that which I thought was right; and there is one thing sure, no one can complain as every matter was looked after in a satisfactory way.

Everyone knows that the Nation is going through a perilous situation. Justice Brandeis, of the Supreme Court of the United States, said in a recent decision: "The people of the United States are confronted with an emergency more serious than war." In a speech made by the late Champ Clark, he said:

"No man should be elected to the House simply to gratify his ambition. All Members should be elected for the good of the country. The best rule, seems to me, is for a district to select a man with at least fair capacity, industrious, honest, energetic, sober, and courageous, and keep him here so long as he discharges his duties faithfully and well. Such a man will gradually rise to high positions and influence in the House. His wide acquaintance with Members helps amazingly in doing things."

My first interest is to obtain some legislation that will pull us out of the tight place we are now in, and regardless of what happens, I am going to stick to my post of duty as long as there is a chance to pass needed laws. Therefore, I will be grateful to my friends for any assistance they can give me.

Faithfully yours,

J. V. McCLINTIC.

INTERNATIONAL ECONOMIC CONFERENCE

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 262.

House Resolution 262

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall proceed to the consideration of House Resolution 247, a resolution approving and encouraging the efforts to hold an international economic conference. After debate in the House, which shall be confined to the resolution and shall continue not to exceed 40 minutes, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the resolution to its adoption or rejection without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I shall be very brief in the time I shall consume in presenting the rule for your consideration. I do that because under the program that is sought to be carried out, the Committee on Rules has several other resolutions, which they desire to present to-day and to-morrow. So I trust the time on this rule and resolution may be as brief as possible.

Members of the House will recall that earlier in the session, by special resolution of the House, the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures was given special authority to make a full investigation of the questions involved in this resolution now presented.

I want to reiterate what I have said to the Members of the House before, that Members of that committee are to be highly commended for the very fine report they have made with reference to the study of this question.

I regard it as going to the very fundamentals of our economic recovery in this country. These matters will be presented by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs and the chairman of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

The rule makes the resolution of the Foreign Affairs Committee in order, which is a brief resolution by which Congress indorses the general principles of an economic conference, which I think all thoughtful minds of the country and of the world now realize is absolutely imperative to begin any ultimate recovery.

It was made necessary for the Committee on Foreign Affairs to introduce the resolution, because it deals with international questions.

I now yield to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM], chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, 10 minutes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, this resolution, which reads as follows—

Resolved, That the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States does hereby approve and encourage the efforts which have been made to hold an international economic conference to be participated in by as many countries as may be willing to send representatives for the purpose of considering methods for the improvement of general economic and monetary conditions—expresses general approval of an international economic conference. I understand that there have been informal conversations carried on by the United States with other governments for more than a year in regard to the possibility of holding a conference on the specific question of silver alone. These communications have shown that there is enough unwillingness or, at least, indifference to a silver conference on the part of nations whose participation would be important, to prevent, as the administration sees it, a really useful or effective gathering. Early in May, however, Great Britain broached to the United States the question of whether we would be interested in an international conference on wider lines. Without making any definite proposal or invitation, they suggested that a world economic conference might serve a useful purpose. The United States responded favorably, indicating some limits as to the topics which could be discussed, but stated it would be glad to participate under appropriate circumstances. This has led to further informal exchanges, and there is now a real prospect that an international meeting of some sort can be held within the next few months. Neither the time nor the place nor the nations who should participate have been settled, but the idea has met such general favorable results that the outlook is promising.

The United States has indicated that it could not submit to a conference of this sort the question of the indebtedness owed to it by the European governments, as it must reserve its position on this topic for its own determination; and it has indicated that the question of the level of American tariff rates was in this country, as in many other countries, considered a problem of domestic policy. No doubt other countries would have some limitations on topics that they would be unwilling to discuss in the conference. I am told, however, that there are some fields of discussion which have already been suggested which seem to afford a useful and acceptable class of subject matters which can be considered and possibly develop some common action between some or all of the nations of the world.

One of these is the question whether some common policies can not be adopted which would tend to raise, or at least prevent the further fall of commodity prices in the world. These prices can be affected to some extent by various measures connected with money, currency, credit, and international exchange. Part of the difficulty with commerce has been the fact that the nations have all been taking methods of self-protection against each other which have tended to strangle commerce and restrict the purchase of goods and the payment of indebtedness.

Another topic might be the problem of cooperation between the various governments and national banking systems toward preventing runs on each other's currency, suppressing the flight from currencies which are constantly alarming various nations, and controlling some of the speculation in international exchange.

Another topic which has been under discussion has been the possibility of some common action to offset the impediments to trade which have been springing up everywhere. Checks on the transmittal of money to foreign countries, the Government control of moneys to be sent abroad, limitations on the export of gold, quota systems, restriction by licensing imports and exports, and even trading by governments themselves as a last resort are the sort of thing that is to-day strangling the normal business intercourse between nations.

Another topic which seems to attract interest and to promise results has been the silver question. All sorts of plans are in the air for the stabilization of silver, perhaps even its use as a means of international payments. There is a large body of responsible opinion in many countries of the world that something might be done about silver by international cooperation. There is an indication that the nations would be willing to discuss this sort of topic; indeed, it has been contemplated from the beginning as one of the things which a conference could undertake.

In short, the general economic conference which is under discussion affords an opportunity for the consideration of many trade, business, and monetary problems which have interested some of us in Congress and have been the subject of wide discussion in print.

Under these circumstances, we have felt that Congress at this time could usefully express its approval of the movement, and that, in view of the movement and of the real prospect of carrying it on to maturity, we ought not to complicate the matter by doing anything further than expressing our approval. The convening of such a conference under proper auspices and with the participation of at least important nations might have very wide effects in stimulating public confidence and in assuring the public that our Government, with others, was going ahead constructively whenever an opportunity afforded. The present economic depression is practically universal. While the recovery of the United States might help world conditions, our recovery will be seriously hampered by the continuance of bad world conditions. The fortunes of the United States are to-day bound up more than ever before with the economic fortunes of the whole world. The world is smaller than it was, our business relationships are closer, and the United States has become a great export and creditor Nation.

I am glad the United States is cooperating with other governments in bringing about this economic conference suggested by Great Britain. It is difficult to bring back prosperity and success by acting alone. The success of the United States and its prosperity are so interwoven with the success and prosperity of the world that it must be a united effort to restore conditions and to bring about harmony and unity throughout the world. The mere passage of laws and appropriation of funds by any one nation will not bring about the desired result. The world is interdependent. The business of the world must be reestablished. There must be some arrangement as to the tariff barriers which prevent one nation from doing business with the other. There must be some equalization of monetary conditions which will allow the proper interchange of financial obligations. What the world needs is a leader, and the world looks to the United States to take this place. It regards the United States as the wealthiest nation and the one that has been able to maintain its gold standard against all pressure. It is the influence of the United States, with its great prestige, which is required by other nations to unite in this great enterprise for world improvement. It is this willingness of the world to let the United States lead and for us to join in such an economic conference embracing the many features outlined in my remarks and contemplated by Great Britain and the United States, which will help bring back coordination of purpose and a united effort for better things.

England had the leadership for many years. She was the great creditor nation of the world. She was the free-trade nation. She had her great warships, great revenue, and international predominance throughout the world. When England spoke other nations listened—not because they were fearful of England but because they had confidence in her wisdom and business ability. Things have changed. We have become the creditor nation of the world. We are looked to for leadership. The influence, power, the good will which we are able to put into this economic conference, means everything to this distracted world.

I am glad we have the opportunity to express our opinion, to unite with other great nations of the world in bringing about harmony and peace not alone in armament but in business relations. We can not lift ourselves by our boot straps. We must all lift together to live together in prosperity and peace.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. The object that Great Britain has in view I think is to formulate an international plan which will raise the commodity price level and then stabilize it internationally. Has the gentleman any information as to whether or not there is a sympathetic response to that particular factor in the present administration of the United States Government?

Mr. LINTHICUM. That is one of the main factors which has been considered. The silver question is in there.

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. FIESINGER. I might answer the question of the gentleman from Maryland by saying that Mr. Rogers of the State Department stated to our committee that the administration was sympathetic, that he was watching and that the President was very much interested.

Mr. COLLINS. Does not the gentleman think the resolution ought to be amended by making it an advisory economic conference? The idea that I have in mind is that the Congress of the United States ought not to be bound by some treaty that might be made by certain officials of this Government with regard to the purely economic affairs of the Nation. My idea is to make it an advisory council.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is all it is.

Mr. COLLINS. It would be binding, if it were in the form of a treaty.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. I do not think the gentleman is correct in that interpretation. Whatever agreement may be reached in this conference must come back to the United States Senate for ratification, and there you have the check that the gentleman now suggests.

Mr. COLLINS. It would not, if it were a treaty.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. But there is no possibility of a treaty. There is no authority given to these people to write any treaty.

Mr. COLLINS. If it is to be merely advisory, why would the gentleman object to calling it an advisory economic conference.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I do not think there is any objection, but I do not think there is any benefit. If there is no benefit to be derived, there is no reason for doing it.

Mr. TINKHAM. I see that reparations, debts, and tariffs are not mentioned.

Mr. LINTHICUM. No.

Mr. TINKHAM. Should they not be specifically included in any resolution concerning an international conference at this time?

Mr. LINTHICUM. The State Department informed me that they have told the governments that it would not include the discussion of any indebtedness to us, that it will not discuss the question of our tariffs, nor will it take up any domestic matter.

Mr. TINKHAM. Should not the resolution be amended to make our action specific, thereby binding the department, so far as the resolution is concerned, within those limits.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I do not think so, because the State Department told me that they had absolutely informed the governments that they would not take up those subjects.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. But they could take them up under that resolution, could they not? There is nothing to prevent it.

Mr. LINTHICUM. And there is nothing to encourage them to do so. This is to hold an economic conference.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. There is nothing in there to prevent them from taking it up.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. If gentlemen will carefully read the resolution, they will come to the determination that there is nothing in this resolution that gives authority to anybody at all, certainly nothing in it that gives authority to our conferees, but it simply indorses the plan of the President and the State Department in cooperating with these other nations on these economic questions.

Mr. BRIGGS. How is it proposed that this conference is to function? Is it through the diplomatic representatives of the United States abroad or by some specially appointed commission? And if it is going to be an especially appointed commission with a large number of advisers, how much is it going to cost the Government?

Mr. LINTHICUM. The Government is not asking for any money. I think it is to be conducted by our men in the service.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. GREEN. On the matter of debt settlement and tariff discussion, that is a matter that was presented in the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, of which I am a member; and I am inclined to feel as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] does, that while it is not altogether necessary to incorporate it in the resolution, yet the resolution would be strengthened if we had an amendment setting out that these subjects should not be discussed, particularly the matter of foreign debts.

Mr. BRIGGS. As I understood the gentleman, he indicated that whatever action might be taken was going to be in the nature of an advisory action, and in any event it would be subject to confirmation by the United States Senate before there could be any binding agreement. In reference to economic matters and commercial matters, is it not true that the Congress of the United States, consisting of both Houses, must be considered? Is it not true that this House, when it comes to economic and commercial matters, has a voice in those matters apart from the usual treaty-making power which is vested in the Senate?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I am glad the gentleman asked that question. I believe that the House of Representatives and the Senate have a very considerable part in the making of arrangements with nations, which might be termed "treaties." I think if anything is accomplished in this conference, it will come back to this Congress as a whole and not to the Senate.

Mr. BRIGGS. Would it not be well to put it in the resolution that a report should be made to the Congress of the United States?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Well, I do not see any objection to it, but I do not see any reason for it, because it is only advisory.

Now, I must conclude. We can pass all the laws and make all the appropriations we choose, but we can not lift ourselves out of the condition in which our country now is by our action alone. This depression is world-wide. It affects every nation in the world. No matter how large or how small they are, they are affected by the present depression. To my mind, the only way in which this world can be brought out of this condition is by the united action of all the great nations of the world. We must act in unison. We must devise ways in a conference of this sort if we want to bring the old world back to former conditions. It is not only money that they need, but they want leadership, and our country, being a great country of 125,000,000 people, having untold wealth, and the largest gold reserve in all the world, they are looking to the United States to lead them out of this morass. It seems to me it is our duty to help lead the world back to its former condition, and that we are a trusteeship for that purpose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman from Maryland five additional minutes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I feel that if we can hold an economic conference and talk to one another across the board, talk the silver question, if you please, talk commodity prices, if you please, talk about all these regulations which have grown up in Europe, that much good will be accomplished.

No money can be sent out of Austria to-day; it does not make any difference what they want to do, not one dollar can be sent out of Austria; and not one dollar can be sent out of Germany to pay a bill unless there is special privilege granted to do it. Then the quota question has been raised by France. All of these things are preventing the restoration of prosperity all over the world. If a conference of this kind can be held and those matters considered, I believe it will do much toward helping out the present situation. But whether it does or does not, we will get to know one another better. We will get to know the ills and benefits derived from various measures, and I think that will be very beneficial to the world.

Mr. COLLINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I yield.

Mr. COLLINS. Does the gentleman believe that as a result of this conference a treaty will be formulated which will be presented to the Senate of the United States?

Mr. LINTHICUM. No; I do not think so.

Mr. COLLINS. Well, what will be the good of the conference if they simply go there and discuss questions?

Mr. LINTHICUM. All conferences do some good.

Mr. COLLINS. The gentleman is certain a treaty will not grow out of this conference?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I do not think so. There might be some reports to Congress, which will be considered by the House and Senate, and I think the House has far greater powers than we have exerted here.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. There is absolutely no danger that any treaty which may be negotiated and even ratified, which involves the monetary system or involves anything over which the House has jurisdiction, would be binding unless we passed enabling legislation?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Of course not. I do not think the gentleman need have any fear on that question. [Applause.]

I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. EATON].

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, through these days of monetary disturbance here comes the next step forward. For 35 years there has rested upon the statute books of the United States the authorization to the President and an appropriation of the funds to have an international conference to discuss monetary problems. In this session of Congress, starting on the 5th day of January, step by step and day by day, the committees of both the House and Senate have listened to the most learned men in all the world express their views and tell some of the facts in connection with the disturbance of the monetary situation.

About a month ago the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures presented a joint resolution to the House which mentioned particularly the subject of maintaining the gold standard, the discontinuance of the debasement of silver, the restoration of debased silver coinage, and other details having to do with money alone. About the same time came the call, not from the United States but from England, for a conference to discuss money disturbance and commodity price levels. This invitation was made public by the State Department on June 2. The resolution of the committee still stands in the RECORD, but another resolution was prepared which seems to me by its words to be merely an acceptance of the invitation in diplomatic language. That is what this resolution provides, and I submit it is one of the longest steps forward in beginning to work a way out of the money disturbance of the entire world that has yet been taken by this body or the body at the other end of the Capitol.

During all this time it has become more and more evident that one of the principal causes of the money disturbance is the glut in the turnover of the money. It is dammed up. It is not moving. Some say, "The velocity has stopped." "The turnover of money has slowed up."

All of our paper money, all of our credit, is based upon the metal that is in our money system. We recognize gold as the standard. Some talk about that standard as something that is elastic, something that goes backward and forward, but no matter what words they use, it is the standard and it is the basis of measure, and by it the value of silver and all other commodities is determined. By the figures representing the value that may be true, but by the intrinsic value, whatever it may be, of gold, all of our money, all of our credit is determined. But gold can not stand alone. It needs the weight and value of silver to make sound money.

Our silver production is lessened. Our gold production is lessened. Last year there was not enough silver produced to meet the demands of the world. Nevertheless in this time of monetary distress the price paid, measured by the gold standard, for silver was less and less and less. It is now almost fixed at a figure approximately half the average it has been for the past 40 years.

When I addressed you on January 5 I suggested that it was necessary to commence the use of more silver money in our own circulation. When silver money is in demand the metal money will begin to flow; the Treasury will be able to take more silver, buy more silver, coin more silver. When the debased silver coins of foreign countries are reestablished on their old basis of weight and fineness their tide will also turn. I also stated that at that time we could not ask the other nations to confer with us on this subject because we were the misers. We have our silver in the Treasury vaults and use paper money therefor. We are hardly touching the metal except for subsidiary money. Therefore we have dried up the demand for the production of any more silver.

Can you not see what the use of silver will do for the present situation? If the silver production of this year were coined and delivered back to the silver producer, it would create new money wealth—wealth of money value which would immediately be put into circulation and start its own velocity or turnover. This would be no gift or dole. It would be original production of wealth that never before had been in existence. Every dollar returned for silver would be paid out for labor and commodities. That new money would stimulate a certain amount of new employment and demand for commodities.

The trouble with the several remedies which have been suggested during this session is that either it was a dole which created a demand for the collection of more taxes, or else it was some interest-bearing obligation which created a demand for collection of more taxes not for the principal sum alone but for an interest charge in addition thereto. The coinage of present production of silver involves neither of these charges upon the taxpayer, but will furnish new money for daily circulation subject to the multiples of velocity which your favorite economic expert will furnish you.

Assuming that this year's production of silver in the United States will reach 30,000,000 ounces, the turnover of this new money in passing from laborer and merchant through the banks and back into circulation would be from tenfold up, and the credit and checking turnover many times more. If new money starts to circulate, then the frozen circulation will begin to thaw and flow.

Is it impossible to conceive that an international group sitting around a conference table will fail to recognize this? I know it is impossible here to-day and with this resolution to accomplish this suggestion, but it is not impossible that such a realization will come to those who are seriously studying the question of money and beginning to learn and apply its fundamental principles in their considerations.

The Republican Party recognized the value of silver in the present monetary situation at its Chicago convention just adjourned, and the following was adopted as a part of that party's platform:

> We favor the participation by the United States in an international conference to consider matters relating to monetary questions, including the position of silver, exchange problems, and commodity prices, and possible cooperative action concerning them.

Another great forward step is in the expressed attitude of members of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. As I understand their position, it is that if the proposed conference does not meet soon, they have under preparation an American doctrine or principle of the use of silver as money which the United States Congress will be invited to consider and adopt. I believe they have the details well in mind, but it seems as if the present step is a necessary one to take before another is officially suggested that we shall establish our own money doctrine in relation to the use of silver as money. It is not for me to speculate about that, although I trust that one of the members of the committee will tell us something about it.

Stabilization of silver is the key to solve the puzzle of this world wide depression. Every sign of the times indicates that if more silver is put into the pocket money of this country, circulation of all money will revive and commodity prices will rise by the revived circulation. [Applause.]

LETTER FROM FEDERAL FARM BOARD

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein a letter from the Federal Farm Board on the wheat supply.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

FEDERAL FARM BOARD,
Washington, June 17, 1932.

Hon. AUGUSTINE LONERGAN,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. LONERGAN: I note that you had placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD figures given you yesterday by me. Apparently I did not make clear the information in regard to one of the items you asked about. The figures 350,000,000 to 400,000,000, instead of 450,000,000, as shown in the RECORD, were not of wheat in private elevators but the various estimates of the carry-over of old wheat in all positions in this country as of July 1.

This carry-over would include holdings of the Stabilization Corporation, wheat in storage in public and private warehouses and mills, and wheat still held on the farms by growers.

Yours very truly,

EDGAR MARKHAM,
Assistant to the Chairman.

INTERNATIONAL ECONOMIC CONFERENCE

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN].

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, this is one of the most important measures that has been before this House; it is of equal importance to any bill that has been up at this session for our consideration, and I regret that the Rules Committee, or the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, did not see that arrangements were made that those who are opposed to the measure could have sufficient time to discuss it properly. Ten minutes is certainly not sufficient time to deal with a subject of this magnitude or importance to the people of this country.

This is a very clever resolution. There is nothing in this resolution that says anything about silver. It does give congressional approval to a conference which is to be held in the future, of which Congress has no knowledge in advance as to what is to be discussed. There is an attempt being made—it has been in progress for a long time—to involve the United States in international affairs. To-day there is meeting at Lausanne a conference presided over by Ramsay MacDonald, Premier of England, and representatives of the French Government, the Italian Government, the German Government, and other interested powers preparing an agenda for this particular conference, to which this resolution refers, which is to be held undoubtedly in October, and is then to recess for the American elections, after which a plenary session is to be held in order to discuss all sorts of plans that will affect the United States. Europe is planning to recess the discussion of war debts, reparations, economic affairs, and tariffs until after the fall elections in America, and this is to-day being arranged between England, France, Italy, and Germany at Lausanne.

It is not a happenstance that this legislation comes up here to-day, because the program on the other side is being carried out to a letter, and we are to go into further conferences with these people at the instance of and the invitation by MacDonald, of England, as agreed upon a few weeks ago over the telephone with Secretary Stimson and approved by the President and Secretary Mills of the Treasury.

I want to read an extract from a letter dated June 3 from an American correspondent of mine in Paris. He is speaking of this conference that is to be held, and discussing the situation. He says:

> You ask my opinion about the Lausanne Conference. I am not a bit optimistic, and I don't think anyone will be willing to reach an accord. The same will apply to the monetary conference later to be held in London. All of these matters will probably go over until after the November elections in the United States. * * * The vicious attacks against the dollar continue, everything is being attacked, the lower the market in New York the stronger the attacks here. According to the great majority of people in Europe nothing is worth anything but real gold—every effort is made to import more gold from the United States.

In reference to these proposed conferences, the more experts each nation is employing—the greater the delay in solving the international problem. Meantime the attacks against the United States continue. The Europeans still believe that they will bring America down to her knees and wipe off the war debts—they don't believe that the United States Budget will be balanced even after the Senate's vote. All attacks up to now were on this point. Now the attacks are that the United States can not collect the amounts voted by the Senate.

It would seem as if these Frenchmen know more about what is going on here in the United States than does the Congress itself, because since the Budget was balanced under presidential edict, we are informed from the same source that the Budget is not now balanced and that between two and three hundred million dollars more must be raised to balance the Budget.

The New York Times, under date of June 8, under a dispatch from Washington, says:

This much appeared clear to-day as the result of London reports that Secretary Stimson had told Sir Ronald Lindsay, the British ambassador, that the United States did not approve the plan for complete cancellation of German reparations. It was tacitly admitted at the State Department that various foreign envoys had made inquiry of him and that all had been informed of the American position.

The article further stated:

Whether Secretary Stimson in his reported conversations with the British ambassador went further than this and conveyed an intimation that, quite apart from the American debt phase, it would be just for Germany to pay a reasonable amount of reparations remained unanswered to-day. Officials declined to elaborate on the three-point informal outline of policy. This silence led to extensive speculation as to how far the United States may have gone informally in encouraging some solution of the reparations problem at the forthcoming Lausanne conference. * * * Ambassador Claudel, of France, called upon Secretary Stimson to-day, and while his visit was said to have been on a matter apart from debts, it was learned that he had been officially informed of the State Department's position as announced shortly before he arrived. In some diplomatic circles it was contended that the American position on reparations would appear to be closer to the French than to the British thesis.

I now want to quote you from the Philadelphia Public Ledger of June 13, 1932, an article by Raymond G. Carroll, Public Ledger foreign service, Paris, June 12. I quote:

Conversing to-day through interpreters * * * Premier Herriot and Prime Minister MacDonald reached "the basis of a common viewpoint" for solution of war debts, reparations, and similar questions at the Lausanne conference on Thursday.

The agreement was made known in a brief statement issued at the close of the conference. While details are closely guarded, MacDonald and Herriot are reported to have agreed upon the following main points:

First. That right now it is impossible to wipe the slate clean of intergovernmental debts because of American insistence on payment of war debts to her and Herriot's fear of his inability to persuade the French Parliament to abandon the margin that France receives from Germany above what France pays to Great Britain and the United States.

Second. That international courtesy prevents their entering into a united front compact to force the United States to cancel war debts, particularly on account of the pending American elections, which might inspire the two Chicago conventions to insert drastic anticancellation and antirevision planks in their party platforms.

Third. That reparations can not be ended at Lausanne nor armaments at Geneva.

PREFERS TO WIPE OUT DEBTS

The British Prime Minister announced his personal preference was to wipe the slate clean of debts, but as the next best plan he proposed extending the Hoover moratorium for six months until after both the German and American elections. The French Premier is willing to grant some sort of an extension, hoping that meanwhile the United States will have changed its position on war debts.

What neither MacDonald nor Herriot will accept, recognize, or allow for is that there is a decided difference between the money loaned by the United States to the Allies, both during the war and after the armistice, and money being drawn from Germany in reparations for punishment and restoration of war damages to property in France and Belgium.

An official communique by Herriot and MacDonald was issued early this afternoon upon the results of meetings last night and this morning. Sir John Simon, British Foreign Secretary, and Louis Germain-Martin, French Finance Minister, and other Anglo-French notables, participated in the meetings.

TEXT OF COMMUNIQUE

The communique read:

"Mr. MacDonald and Sir John Simon met again this morning with Premier Herriot and Louis Germain Martin to continue the conversations which were started yesterday. These friendly semi-official conversations have brought out a community of views which will permit just and efficacious solutions at the Lausanne conference, as well as strengthening confidence and the maintenance of peace among peoples."

After the first general debate at Lausanne only a provisional solution of the reparations problem is to be sought. Germany will make no agreement ever to resume reparations payments and France will not consent to any unilateral repudiation by Germany of the latter's treaty obligations.

Therefore, to avoid a deadlock upon a legal issue, there probably will be a de facto and provisional extension of the Hoover moratorium to Germany and others until the end of the year, when the next installment of Europe's debt to America again will fall due.

WILL SET UP COMMITTEES

Before adjourning the conference also will set up several technical committees. One or two dealing with the wider financial and economic issues will sit at London, and with American help will prepare an agenda for the proposed world economic conference next October.

The conference would go into technical committees during the American elections in November and reemerge as a plenary conference after the election, when the American policy should be restated or changed to fit the European purpose.

I would call your particular attention to the fact that it is here disclosed as the personal preference of the British Prime Minister to wipe the slate clean of all debts. If this can not be done, he proposes to extend the Hoover moratorium for six months until after the American elections, and that it is the position of the French Premier that he is willing to grant some sort of an extension in the hope that meanwhile the United States will have changed its position on war debts. I would also point out that in which they both agree, that there is no difference between the money loaned by the United States to the Allies, both during the war and after the armistice, and money being drawn from Germany in the form of reparations. And I would point out that the position of the United States is in direct conflict with this stated position of England and France.

I desire also to call your attention to the statement at the Lausanne conference there will be set up several technical committees. One of these committees will sit at London, and, with American help, will prepare an agenda for the proposed world economic conference next October. This is the conference that is being arranged for in the resolution that is now before the House for consideration. At this October London conference, this technical committee will be in session, and after the American elections, will reemerge as a plenary conference sitting in London, when they expect the then American policy to be restated or changed to fit the European purpose. To fit the European purpose! Does anybody here contend that they know what the European purpose is? It contemplates a modification of America's position, and that is the thing to which I am objecting in this resolution. Under a guise of doing something to improve the price of silver and the purchasing power of those countries in the world that are on a silver basis, we are passing a resolution that makes no reference whatsoever to silver.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. SOMERS], who introduced this resolution, prepared previously a resolution proposing to call a world conference on silver and submitted it to the Secretary of State. The Secretary of State did not approve of that resolution, but does approve of this resolution, because this resolution will permit the full acceptance, with the approval of Congress, of the invitation of the Prime Minister of England, and will give to the representatives of the United States in this conference the approval and encouragement of the Congress of the United States which will practically assure in advance approval of whatever negotiations are consummated.

This is what is involved in this resolution. Gentlemen, cancellation of war debts and reparations are involved here. You are taking a step here to-day when you do not know what you are doing unless you are watching all of the maneuvers of those people in Europe and in this country who are interested in getting us into the conference. Have we not suffered sufficiently with our meddling in European affairs?

Mr. Speaker, I know I shall not have time to finish the remarks I want to make, and therefore ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McFADDEN. Biennial elections since the war have invariably disclosed that public sentiment in this country is nationalistic and favors a policy of political isolation. That has been the mandate which the people have given to successive administrations. That is the policy which successive Congresses have favored. Yet the executive branch of the Government has been almost continuously in the hands of an aggressive minority who, while professing adherence to the mandate of the elections, have followed a very different policy.

Now, we have that situation here presented in this particular bill. I am told that this is an administration bill, but apparently both sides of the House, the chairman and the ranking Member on the Republican side, are for this internationalistic viewpoint.

Meddling Secretaries of State, with the aid of meddling Secretaries of the Treasury, have from time to time injected themselves into the European situation at critical moments there and delivered themselves of judgments upon purely European questions with which we should have had nothing to do.

The international banking power has directed their course, and vanity and an ambition to move upon a more spacious stage, perhaps, have actuated them; but the result of their ventures has invariably been unnecessarily to complicate the international situation, and it has certainly retarded the slow and natural trend toward international readjustments in Europe.

They are obsessed with a desire to shore and bolster up the outworn and ramshackle structure of the treaty of Versailles, a treaty to which their own Government had refused to become a party, a treaty for which, and for the régime of misery which has followed it in Europe, the international bankers are responsible.

The Allies would never have succeeded in imposing the preposterous $33,000,000,000 war indemnity upon the Germans in the form of negotiable gold bonds, a device primarily aimed at the financial stability of the United States, nor the scarcely less preposterous Dawes plan without the vigorous aid of our then Secretary of State. The reparations question would have been settled long ago by the annulment of reparations and would now be forgotten if busybodies in our State and Treasury Departments had kept their hands off it.

But this course would not have suited the international bankers. They were the makers of the treaty of Versailles, and they were obligated to the allied governments to see that those provisions which affected America should be carried out. They were obligated to sell the reparation gold bonds here, and they looked forward to taking their 8 per cent commissions. This is why our State and Treasury Departments have concerned themselves so persistently with European crises over reparations, while assuring the American public that reparations are a purely European question with which the United States has nothing to do.

At the present time we have a financial observer in Europe watching every move—one of the most prominent there. He is the one who sat in at the writing of the treaty of Versailles. He sat in at the drawing of the Dawes plan. He sat in at the drawing of the Young plan, and he is the direct representative of the international financial interests of New York. I refer to Norman H. Davis, who is now in Europe commuting between Geneva, The Hague, Basel, Lausanne, Paris, and London.

Invariably when the Allies have brought pressure upon Germany to continue raparation obligations, State Department action has taken the form of support of allied demands. This is what has been retarding settlement of the question in Europe, for the Germans have already paid all that they justly owe, and the reparations ought to be canceled. The question has no connection whatever with the fact that the Allies owe war debts to the United States.

The British and Italians know that the reparations jig is up, and just at this juncture when some action is to be taken at Lausanne they have asked the French to agree to the cancellation of further reparations. The State Department has very properly informed them that the United States would have no sympathy with a proposal for cancellation contingent upon the annulment of the war debts which are owed to this country. Having this in mind, the British and Italians are, nevertheless, ready to join with France in a total annulment of German reparations. The French are not willing to agree to this; and, if press reports are to be credited, our meddling Secretary of State has intervened to support the French position and has gone far out of his sphere in order to do it. Inasmuch as he has not denied the press reports, it may be inferred that they are true.

The press reports, which I have heretofore referred to, are to the effect that Secretary Stimson conveyed an intimation to the foreign ambassadors in Washington that, quite apart from the American debt phase, it would be just for Germany to pay a reasonable amount of reparations. I repeat, "The American position on reparations," say these reports, "would appear to be closer to the French than to the British thesis, and this may influence results at Lausanne."

Mr. Speaker, if the Secretary of State did, in fact, intimate to the European ambassadors that it would be just that Germany should continue to pay reparations, it was not merely an act of officiousness and meddling; it was a political crime that he committed. It was a statement made in flaunting defiance of the fixed position of the Government of the United States that reparations are a purely European question which does not concern the United States; it passes a moral judgment that ought not to be passed, and it conveys a warning to the German Government that at this moment of crisis in Europe the Government of the United States stands squarely in support of French policy.

It discloses the persistent purpose of this administration to put the Young plan into full operation in the United States. That plan was forced upon Germany in 1929 by a stupid, clumsy, and brutal display of duress in the hope that the $3,000,000,000 worth of negotiable reparation bonds which it created for the benefit of the Allied treasuries might be disposed of in the United States, and in 1930 this administration opened the doors of Wall Street to the sale of the bonds. No sooner did the administration suggest a moratorium on all public debts last June than it proceeded to enter into an agreement with the French Government that the moratorium should apply to everybody except the Germans and that the Germans should be required to pay larger unconditional annuities than if the moratorium had not gone into effect.

The meddlers and busybodies at the other end of the Avenue have, in fact, made themselves the agents of the allied governments and of the international bankers to compel Germany to continue to submit to the yoke of the Young plan in order that allied treasuries may be fattened by the sale of the Young plan bonds here.

These unpatriotic policies ought to be reversed, and without delay. The files of the State Department are filled with proof that under the peace agreement made with President Wilson Germany has paid all the reparations that she owed. President Hoover knows it, and Secretary Stimson knows it, or if he does not know it he is incompetent to hold the position which he occupies. The United States Government knows that a demand for further reparations from Germany has no basis in justice. A new and different administration of our State Department is needed, and it can not come too soon. The United States should not take sides with any country in Europe, but should remain neutral. I am unalterably opposed to our country going into a further conference with European nations. When general economic and general monetary matters are to be discussed, because war debts and reparations are bound to be discussed, and these nations want us in this conference so that they can be discussed not as debts owed to us but as a general economic monetary solution.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, the distinguished ranking Republican member of the Committee on Banking and Currency is still harping on the old, old theme and croaking in his utterances about intermeddling in foreign affairs.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I decline to yield. He does this as if this great Government of ours can separate itself from the family of nations, as if we can live here with a great financial and economic wall around us that bars us from all communications whatsoever with the outside world. He would huddle us together in a little compact space and ignore, if he could, conditions prevailing abroad.

The morning papers carry the very encouraging report from the meeting at Lausanne that the French and British Governments have come to an understanding as to suspending further payments of reparations. That has been acclaimed and will be acclaimed not only in continental Europe but throughout all the world.

In denial of the gentleman's statement that our dollar is going down, I will call his attention to the fact that in the last several days, by reason of international arrangements and by reason of the fact that France has no longer any earmarked gold in this country, for the first time in several months the amount of gold coming into this country is greater than that going out, and that the price of the dollar has been reestablished in all countries as regards foreign exchanges.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the genteman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that France has earmarked gold here.

Mr. STAFFORD. But that balance is no longer a threat as is shown by the fact that the price of the dollar has once more been reestablished. No longer is the exchange value of the dollar below that which it costs to send the dollar abroad.

The gentleman seems to gloat over our financial reverses when the fact is we have now reestablished the gold dollar on a firm basis so that it is more expensive to export the gold dollar for the first time in many months past. That is the reading of the market on the New York Exchange within the last few days.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman is aware that has been brought about by exports since we passed the moratorium of $1,500,000,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. No; it has not been brought about by the moratorium, and this Government does not intend to be a party to any further moratoriums with Great Britain. The fact is, if the gentleman would be frank about it, that because of the agreement between Ramsay MacDonald and Paul Herriot, the Premier of France, even France will not exact from Germany the unconditional payments which she required under the Young plan against the position of President Hoover when he advanced the moratorium.

We are a member of the great family of nations, and it seems out of place for the gentleman to get up here constantly and attack our Government when in these crucial moments it is the part of heroism and it is the part of statesmanship to stand back of the Government and maintain the dollar on a safe and sound basis. If there is any time in recent months when we are in a position to be encouraged by conditions, it is now, in view of the fact that for the first time in months the price of the dollar has been reestablished. [Applause.]

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. Does the gentleman know it is the declared position now of the State Department that German reparation payments should not be canceled?

Mr. STAFFORD. It has been the consistent position of the administration that the foreign-government debts were in no wise to be considered with reparations; and when the Secretary of State acceded to the request of MacDonald to join this conference, he made it an express condition that foreign-debt settlement and reparations would be banned from consideration.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. However, our administration is not so circumscribed that it does not realize that we are a part and parcel of international development, so that we should not consider these great international affairs that are moving in the currents of trade and in the currents of finance. I am surprised that the gentleman should consistently make croaking statements to discourage the upper trend of American finance. It ill becomes the gentleman to always keep on croaking and croaking against this Government, the greatest Government on the face of the earth. [Applause.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH], and that will conclude the time on the rule.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Speaker, I think there is great misapprehension about this gold situation. In the first place, we are a creditor nation, and, in the second place, we have a favorable balance of trade. With these two factors existing we are bound, in the long run, to have a favorable position as regards our gold supply.

You will not find any authority connected with the Federal reserve system who will tell you that there is the slightest apprehension on the part of the Federal reserve system or on the part of the Treasury Department as to our gold supply. The Federal reserve system has retarded its purchase of Government bonds, I think very unwisely; but they did not retard their purchases, as the papers say, because of exportations of gold. They retarded their gold purchases because, in their judgment, the banks were not using the funds which were being supplied. I want to emphasize the fact that I think their policy and their judgment are entirely wrong.

The value of this international conference depends entirely upon the character of men who represent the United States in the conference. If we send to this conference men who understand thoroughly that the improper manipulation of the medium of exchange in all countries is the curse of society, then nothing but good can come from the conference.

As far as the Congress is concerned, the obligation of the Congress, it seems to me, is clear to support the conference. The obligation does not rest upon the Members of Congress to select the representatives who shall go from this country; and as to the necessity of an international conference on economic questions, involving principally the monetary question, which can not do any harm and which may do a vast amount of good to the suffering people of the world, there can be no question, in my judgment, and I hope the resolution will be adopted.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, before we discuss the merits of the resolution I desire to submit a unanimous-consent request. We have several more rules on the calendar that we are very anxious to dispose of, if possible, to-morrow, and I therefore submit the unanimous-consent request that when we adjourn to-night we adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman give us a list of the rules referred to?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I shall be very glad to do that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I hardly think it is necessary to meet at 11 o'clock.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Alabama couple with his request that Private Calendar business be dispensed with? Otherwise, private bills would be in order to-morrow.

Mr. STAFFORD. No; that is not in order, necessarily.

Mr. BLANTON. It is in order. The new rule has never been abrogated except by nonobservance.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will state to the gentleman that these matters are privileged.

Mr. BLANTON. What we are trying to understand is that no private bills will be in order to-morrow. Is it understood that we are not going to take up any private bills to-morrow?

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is the purpose to-morrow not to take up the Private Calendar, but to try to finish the rules.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman withhold his objection until we get a list of the rules?

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is the expectation to finish the rule on this resolution and then to call up for consideration a rule providing for the consideration of the Davis bill, which involves an amendment of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act with reference to loans to farmers for growing crops.

Mr. PURNELL. The gentleman does not mean that he is going to call that up immediately following the pending resolution?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I hardly think it will be possible to do anything else except to conclude consideration of the pending matter to-day; but we are very anxious to consider these resolutions, and I think I have the concurrence in this of the minority members of the Rules Committee.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman proceed with the list of rules?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Another is a resolution appointing a committee on expenditures in the presidential election, which is the usual resolution, and the Senate has acted on a similar one.

There is a little bill from the Immigration Committee, to which there is no opposition and which has been recommended by the State Department; then there is a matter giving the right to the Post Office Department to make some agreement about the New York post office; then the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH], to set up a select committee on investigation of post-office matters. This will conclude the program, and I think there will be no opposition to two or three of these rules.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, from my acquaintance with all these matters to which the gentleman has referred, I do not think they will require much time. I can not see any need of our meeting out of order at 11 o'clock, and I therefore object.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who spoke to-day on the kidnaping bill be given five legislative days within which to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

INTERNATIONAL ECONOMIC CONFERENCE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution.

House Resolution 247

Resolved, That the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States does hereby approve and encourage the efforts which have been made to hold an international economic conference to be participated in by as many countries as may be willing to send representatives for the purpose of considering methods for the improvement of general economic and monetary conditions.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCKEOWN].

Mr. MCKEOWN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, on January 11 of this year I introduced House Joint Resolution 199, the purpose of which was to call an international conference on the question of silver. I suppose the most of you are familiar with the law, as mentioned by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. EATON] relative to the question of bimetallism, and relative to calling a conference at such time as might be necessary to consider this question of silver.

The world to-day stands at the crossroads. We must have more money, or we must, as a result, have bankruptcy or repudiation.

The monetary systems of the world are based on gold and silver. Gold, on account of its scarcity, is considered a precious metal, but gold and silver have been the money through the years used by the various nations and people of the earth, and from time immemorial silver has been the money of mankind, especially the poor races. The poor people have always had silver for their money and that is true to-day.

Now millions of people in the world—in the Orient, Mexico, and South America—depend on the use of silver for their money and for their savings.

Our monetary system was undermined when, in 1920, the fractional coins of silver were debased through the English realm. In 1921 it was followed by a reduction in the weight and fineness of the Mexican peso, and the doom of silver was finally sealed by the adoption of the gold standard in India, which was forced into French Indo-China and resulted in the collapse of the China exchange.

As a result there has been a great political and social distress throughout the world.

This conference has been called by the British Government not only on the silver question but also to include economics. While we talked the British Government called for the conference. It would have been much better if the United States had called a conference in this country, because then we would have had near at hand some of the best silver and monetary experts in the world.

But now, when we go to conference in Great Britain, they will have the great experts on the silver question, and efforts will be made to still debase silver. Why, gentlemen, there is no reason why there should be any scarcity of money in this country to do business.

I have introduced into this Congress a bill for the purchase of silver, by which we can take both metals, because the country is on a bimetal system, and use it to expand the currency and not to inflate the currency. [Applause.]

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak for three minutes out of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, and Members of the House, I do not want in any way to open up the wounds of the bonus debate. To the contrary, I want to do everything in my power to pour oil on the troubled waters, and balm upon the scars, and to bind up the wounds. I am taking this opportunity to appeal to the members of the House to try to secure consideration before we adjourn of a bill introduced by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BACHARACH], which reduces the rate of interest upon the loans made by veterans on their adjusted-service certificates. There is a justifiable complaint and grievance among 4,000,000 veterans that they have been obliged by the Government to pay a rate of interest on the loans from 4 to 6 per cent, by which the Government actually profits at the expense of the veterans. If these high rates of interest are permitted to continue, the adjusted-service certificates, upon which 50 per cent loans have been made, will have little or no value by 1945. It is unfair and unjust, and as long as that condition exists there will be complaint among the 4,000,000 veterans because they know that these certificates will be eaten up by the high interest rates. There will be no value left to the certificates when they become due, or for protection to the widows and orphans in case of the death of the veteran.

If we want to take a step that will be fair to the veterans and do much to allay the discontent and bitterness among the veterans who, on account of the deplorable economic conditions, have been obliged to borrow on their certificates, then in the remaining days of the session we should see to it that this Bacharach bill is passed, reducing the rate of interest not to 4 per cent, as contained in the bill, but to 3 per cent, and that will, in my opinion, adequately take care of the rate of interest so that the Government will break even. That is one way to bind up the wounds. The Bacharach bill also contains a provision that those veterans who have not made application or were not able to do so for the certificates within the last two years shall be permitted to borrow on them without waiting the expiration of the 2-year limit. I introduced several months ago identical bills, except that I provided for a 3 per cent rate of interest instead of 4.

Mr. Speaker, I listened to the debate in the Committee on Foreign Affairs when the proposal now under consideration for an economic and monetary conference was being presented. It was reported unanimously. I could not see any objection at that time to holding such a conference; nor do I now, after listening to the arguments of the opposition. All kinds of minor objections have been raised here. All we propose is to support the President, who has already negotiated with Great Britain for the calling of such a conference. How can the greatest, the richest nation in the world refuse to attend a world-wide economic and monetary conference?

It is true the resolution as originally introduced by Mr. SOMERS of New York proposed a silver conference. I objected to that because I thought that if such a proposal went out to the people, at least in my State, they would think it had something to do with undermining the gold standard and that it would have a bad psychological effect, because the people back home might consider it an attempt to take us off the gold standard. I thought if it went out as a silver conference purely, many misunderstandings would arise which might adversely affect public confidence in the preservation of the gold standard and cause further runs on banks and on our gold reserves. The resolution in its present form calling for an economic and monetary conference is a compromise and I know of no reason why it should not be supported.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, as this session comes to a close, I thought it might be interesting to the Members to have in summarized form a statement showing the appropriations for the coming year as compared to those of the last year.

The following statement indicates that the appropriations for 1932 were approximately $3,750,000,000, while those for the coming year are about $3,145,000,000, or a reduction of over $600,000,000 or 16 per cent. If you will add to this $600,000,000, the savings put into effect by the recent economy bill, which is estimated by the Comptroller General to equal $150,000,000, you will note that the total savings for the coming year is over $750,000,000, or a reduction of 20 per cent.

Taking into consideration the fact that we spend nearly $2,000,000,000 on national defense and care of disabled veterans, which items are very difficult to reduce, this Congress is to be complimented on having accepted the recommendations of the President and having reduced the expenses of our Government by three-quarters of a billion dollars. I think we can safely say that this is the greatest reduction ever made by any Government in a single year.

While these reductions have been great, it is to be regretted that the majority party in this Congress, under the Democratic leadership, has refused to give the President power to eliminate and consolidate the many overlapping and duplicating duties of the various bureaus and departments of Government. I hope that in the next session of Congress, when the election is out of the way, this Congress will take the courageous step of giving to the Executive the power to reorganize the executive departments of this Government and put into effect permanent economies that will reduce the expenses of Government to where they ought to be.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FIESINGER].

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Speaker, when I came into the House I was placed on the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, in addition to other assignments. I am very glad to have gotten that assignment. It has been a real pleasure to serve on that committee and on the subcommittee under the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. SOMERS]. As was said by my colleague Mr. BANKHEAD, this is one of the most important subjects that has come up in this Congress. I have no interest whatsoever in any silver mine; I have never seen a silver mine, and I have no stock in any silver mine. I know of none of my friends who has any interest in a silver mine. Since I have heard this testimony, I will go further than my colleague from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], and say that this proposition offers one of the real hopes of the world in its present dying economic condition. On several occasions, as we were developing the testimony, going forward in that committee to the proposition of an international conference, I said to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOMERS] that I was afraid of an international conference upon this subject unless we had men appointed who were sympathetic with the proposition.

I believe that the administration is sympathetic toward the proposition, although I do not think that they consider it one of major importance. As a matter of fact the Republican platform adopted in Chicago declares for sound money and also declares that the silver question be investigated. I infer from that that silver may be used in connection with sound money. We decided in that committee three things. First, that we want to stay upon the gold standard. The committee has no idea of going off the gold standard. It has no idea of adopting silver into our money system with any fixed ratio, and I want you to get that clearly in your mind. Our committee believes thoroughly in sound money. In that there is no difference from the platform that was adopted by the Republican Party in Chicago this week. I suggested to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOMERS] on several occasions, as I say, that I was not so keen for a world economic conference, although we were talking to all of the witnesses all the time about a world economic conference.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio one additional minute.

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Speaker, I want to say in this one minute that while I do not think much will come from the international conference, the committee, while it favored the international conference, if the conference does not accomplish what we think it should accomplish, intends to go forward with several successive steps to adopt an American policy with reference to silver. [Applause.] We will take the lead in America upon this proposition in the way I have indicated, to keep the gold standard, no bimetallism, and sound money.

In brief, we would add silver to our metal reserves at the gold price of silver and invite nations similarly interested to do likewise. We would keep it in the form of silver bullion, issue silver certificates against it, redeemable at any time at the gold price of silver. By so doing we could increase the price of silver and stabilize it at a point we desire to stabilize commodity prices.

This in my judgment would put us on an exchange basis with the Orient and other silver-using countries and give us a market for the products of our farms, mines, and factories. It would put the men back to work. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Utah [Mr. COLTON].

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, because I happen to come from a silver-producing State, some of the Members of Congress seem to feel that I am interested only in silver. Inasmuch as the subject has been injected into the debate, let me say that the silver-producing States—and I speak for at least one of them—are not advocating going off the gold standard. We do believe, however, that the silver problem must play a great part in any program providing for the readjustment of the economic conditions of the world.

No economic conference held to discuss the monetary problems of the world would be successful which did not include silver in its agenda. One-half of the people of the world use silver as the sole medium of exchange. Money could not be discussed without speaking of silver. Gold and silver are the only metals used in the world to any great extent as money. It therefore follows, of course, that silver will be discussed at this conference. It should be discussed.

The American Farm Bureau Federation under date of June 15, 1932, released a statement, a part of which is as follows:

> Fluctuations in the average commodity price level unbalance all relationship between the different classes of our people, especially the relationship of debtor and creditor. When such changes are large, great hardships are entailed.
> It is therefore imperative that in order to save millions of our people from bankruptcy the general price level of commodities be restored to that prevailing when the average of the long-term debts, both public and private, were contracted.

I subscribe to that statement, and it therefore follows that the monetary laws of this country, and of the other countries of the world, should be so changed that the gold unit shall be constant in its purchasing power. We must also work in conjunction with other nations to reestablish silver to its proper place in monetary use. Changes will have to be made in the monetary base and in the currency and credit systems of the world. Unless this is done cooperatively, we can never meet the full requirements of industry, commerce, and agriculture in this country and in the other countries of the world. The best practical way to accomplish this is through an international conference at which the monetary systems of the world can be fully considered and at which the stabilization of commodity prices can be considered. Until something of this kind is done we shall continue to be entirely out of balance, credit will be curtailed, and the necessary confidence entirely lacking.

I do not see why it is that every time an economic conference of this kind is suggested, some one sees back of it the "ghost of silver," by which they mean bimetallism. This question will never be settled right until silver does have its proper and legitimate place as a monetary metal. It will then not be a ghost but a reality. "No question is ever settled until it is settled right."

For months we have been trying in this House to pass legislation to relieve the economic conditions of this country, but we have not entirely succeeded as yet. Whatever has been the result, we are not relieving the credit situation as it should be relieved.

It is true that we have loaned, through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, a great deal of money. The failure of banks has been checked, if not altogether stopped, but this money which we have loaned is ultimately finding its way into the large banks. The large financial institutions are calling upon the smaller banks to pay their obligations but these large institutions are not in turn loaning money to any great extent to industry and therefore industry continues to languish. There is lack of confidence everywhere and there is nothing which indicates that, with our monetary gold reserve, and with the prospect of producing gold in the future, there will be enough gold to form an adequate monetary or credit base. We might just as well face that situation squarely.

Everyone must admit that our trade with silver-using countries is very greatly decreased. The credit base in our own country is insufficient, and there is no good reason why the monetary base could not be broadened by using silver to supplement the gold. This does not mean that silver shall be coined at any fixed ratio. It simply means that it could be used to supplement the gold base or, in other words, to strengthen the gold standard. This is done now to a limited extent. The dollar bills issued are redeemable in silver. There is no possible reason why other currency, particularly in the smaller denominations, should not be redeemable in silver. Further, there is no reason why an agreement could not be made with silver-using countries and the rate of exchange determined, and our silver could be made a monetary metal and could be used between this country and those countries as we now use gold as the money of ultimate redemption in the gold-standard countries. This does not mean that there would be any fixed ratio. It would, of course, in the very nature of things, increase the price of silver, an end to be devoutly wished. It would also increase our trade with the Orient and go a long way toward stabilizing commodity prices.

There is another thing we might just as well admit and face squarely. We can not deny that the international bankers of the world are playing a game of checkers with the gold supply. They are moving it back and forth from one Nation to another at will. The monetary gold reserve and the prospects for added supply are not sufficient for an adequate monetary and credit base. This is perfectly apparent. The silver advocates are not trying to supplant gold but to supplement and strengthen it. Whatever use there may be of silver as monetary metal, I repeat, must be as a supplemental base and to strengthen the gold standard. We believe in sound money, and all of this talk that this conference means bimetallism or the exclusive use of silver is altogether wrong. The gold supply has proven inadequate, and something must be done to supplement it. Silver is the only logical metal to use for this purpose.

The stabilization of commodity prices and the use of silver for the purposes I have mentioned will be the greatest step which can be taken toward economic recovery. I am firmly convinced that there can be no final recovery from this depression until a broadened credit base is established. The use of silver will put our miners back to work.

The men who live in the mineral-producing areas are the most liberal spenders in the world. They buy from our farmers, from our manufacturers, and, in fact, are felt in all of the avenues of commerce. Restore the value of silver and you restore prosperity. You will increase the trade with the oriental nations, and all of these things combined will reflect in the business life of the entire world, and particularly in our own country. It can be clearly shown that the drop in the price of silver has always been followed by a drop in all commodity prices. The very opposite of that is also true. The increase in the price of silver has always been followed by an increase in commodity prices.

Mr. Speaker, this international conference is absolutely necessary before there can be permanent economic recovery and complete prosperity.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLTON. I yield for a brief question.

Mr. McFADDEN. Is not the gentleman aware that this conference will be dominated by the international financial crowd?

Mr. COLTON. Oh, I have no such fear as that at all. I believe in the integrity of America. I believe in the integrity of other nations. Of course, the success of this conference will depend almost entirely upon the men sent to the conference. The personnel is of the utmost importance. Men should be chosen who understand every phase of this situation. I certainly hope and confidently believe that some one will go from this country who thoroughly understands the silver situation. A mistake will be made if such a man is not appointed. I believe that the President of the United States will see that this is done. He understands the situation as well as any man in the world. I believe these men will try honestly to bring out of this chaos a just and correct solution of the economic laws of the day. I hope this resolution will pass and that the conference will be held at a very early date. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Utah has expired.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WEST].

Mr. WEST. Mr. Speaker, it is becoming increasingly evident as the economic depression continues that it is no longer simply local but is general throughout the world, and that improvement in the general conditions will be secured only through international cooperation and not through action by our country alone. The dislocation of the exchanges, the disproportionate holdings of gold of the various countries, the disastrous decline of international trade, and the low purchasing power of silver are all aspects of a serious world problem that can only be solved by common international action. The purpose of this resolution before us is to encourage the holding of an international economic and monetary conference for the consideration of methods whereby these conditions can be improved.

But it is urged against this measure that the conditions in the world to-day are so delicate and so likely to be further disturbed by the proposed conference that it would be unwise at this time to hold it. This, Mr. Speaker, is simply the negative attitude or the counsel of inactivity that is recommended when one is confronted with a difficult or unpleasant task. It is like the man who has a house with a leaking roof. When it is raining he can not repair it; and in good weather he neglects to repair it. The result is that the bad condition continues.

In international affairs if we are blindly going to proceed in accordance with the doctrine of laissez faire and continue to permit unwise economic policies to exist in the trade relations of different nations it is altogether possible that even more serious conditions will develop than we have at the present time.

A few years ago I was on a great ocean steamer going from Iceland to the North Cape of Norway. When we passed out of the warm waters of the Gulf Stream into the cold water of the Arctic Ocean a dense fog descended upon us. For two days we proceeded through that fog by dead reckoning from the various instruments on the steamer. As we came near the shore it was impossible for the captain to locate the position of the ship. In spite of the fact that the ship had all of the instruments of modern navigation for such purpose, the ship was lost in the fog and the captain was obliged to turn the rudder in such manner that the steamer went around in a circle for 24 hours, until the fog lifted.

Our Nation to-day is helpless in the grip of this economic depression. Like this steamer, it is lost in the fog of the depression and is going around in a circle of unwise economic policies. Here is our Government, in which we have made the most stupendous investment of our national income of any nation in the world, utterly powerless to cope with the situation.

During this present year upwards of $14,000,000,000 have been spent in the municipalities, States, and the Nation upon the various agencies of government. In this Government we have established the greatest fact-finding agencies that exist anywhere in the world for the purpose of enabling us to form sound judgments and determine wise policies in connection with our national problems. Yet we have been unwilling to face frankly the fact of this world-wide crisis and acknowledge our proper share of responsibility in connection with it. We have been unwilling to admit that there is a vital economic and monetary relationship existing among the nations of the world, and we have been reluctant to cooperate with other nations in an effort to establish sound policies in international affairs for the general improvement of world conditions.

Unless we restore confidence in the integrity of our political institutions and reestablish more securely the fundamental belief in the ability of our financial and economic institutions to function in this crisis, our Nation is certain to become more helpless in the grip of this depression and will continue to suffer from the direful consequences of our inactivity.

For this reason I am in favor of the proposed international economic and monetary conference recommended in this resolution. This is not primarily a silver conference, even though the problem of the effect of the low price of silver in the silver-standard countries will be considered. Nor is this a conference for the promotion of any particular scheme or theory of readjustment; it is simply a recommendation that we as a nation frankly recognize the vital importance to us of cooperating with other nations in an effort to improve economic and monetary conditions and an expression of our approval of an international conference to consider in a straightforward manner the facts of the world economic depression.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. AMLIE].

Mr. AMLIE. Mr. Speaker, I am going to address my remarks primarily to the majority members of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. When they made their report a month ago I agreed with them in their report, but with the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PERKINS], and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. THURSTON], and several other Members I was not able to agree with their findings of fact and the conclusions that they drew therefrom.

It seems to me that in joining with the Committee on Foreign Affairs the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures fundamentally are losing their orginal position.

The Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures believed that through stabilizing the price of silver at a somewhat higher level than that which now obtains we could put the gold-standard countries in a relatively better position than at the present time; that England and other countries now dealing with silver as a measure of value would be placed in a relatively disadvantageous position as compared with the United States which is on a gold-standard basis.

To do this the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures proposed a conference, called by the United States, limiting the subject of the conference to a discussion of those methods which would have as their objective the raising of the price of silver and the stabilizing of the price of silver.

In other words, if we compel England and other countries to deal with a measuring stick of value which is higher, it would put us in a relatively better position from the standpoint of meeting competition in the markets of the world. It was the belief of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures that it was the proper way to proceed in order to protect the gold standard. Now we are putting something else into the resolution that is before us. We are going in not on a conference called by the United States or by the President of the United States, but we are going in on a conference called by England. The Government of Great Britain has issued an invitation to the Government of the United States to attend that conference for the discussion of the economic and financial conditions that are responsible for and which may prolong the world crisis. They may bar from this conference any discussion of silver or any methods or means that might be adopted to increase the price of silver.

The significance of the matter is that we are interested in increasing commodity prices on the one hand, while England, on the other hand, is not interested in increasing commodity prices, but is interested in decreasing commodity prices or at least is interested in stabilizing commodity prices far below the point where we would want them stabilized if we are to avoid general bankruptcy.

I want to read a few brief excerpts from the MacMillan report, which might properly be said to be a statement of British policy as regards monetary matters and world commodity prices. The report states:

If matters continue as at present, it will be the debtor countries of the world and not a creditor country, such as Great Britain, which will be the first to find the strain unbearable. We consider that the leading creditor countries of the world should consult together to prevent matters from continuing as at present.

At the present time the objective of raising the international price level would probably command widespread, though not universal approval. When, however, it begins to rise again a more widespread difference of opinion will soon emerge as to how far the recovery should be allowed to go.

A point may come when the encouragement of a further rise, though desirable in itself, may be difficult or impossible without running the risk of setting loose uncontrollable forces which will generate an undesired inflation carrying the price level much beyond the equilibrium point, with the prospect of an injurious reaction, equally uncontrollable, at a subsequent stage.

It would be unwise to calculate upon a price level being reached, even if recovery takes place now, which would restore the precise relationship which existed, before the events of 1929, between the level of British money incomes and prices and those of the outside world. Even this relationship was an unsatisfactory one.

I do not minimize the difficulties of such a course, but I am reminded that this country is still the greatest creditor nation and we are the largest market in the world.

I am not unmindful of the fact that exports are vital to the well-being of this country but I am convinced that our dominions, as well as those foreign countries which have almost unlimited quantities of various food supplies, would be only too wishful to enter into arrangements with us for our mutual benefit. Besides, some of these countries as well as our dominions must continue to supply us with foodstuffs in order to pay for the interest on and repayment of their indebtedness to us."

Compare the foregoing statements with the following, also taken from the same report:

We are emphatically of the opinion that, even if a further fall of wholesale prices be avoided, their stabilization at approximately the present level would be a serious disaster for all countries of the world alike; and that the avoidance of such an event should be a prime object of international statesmanship.

Thus, a failure by the central banks of the world to attempt to redress the fall of prices, in our judgment, would endanger the principles on which modern economic society is founded, namely the dependence of the productive process on the expectation of normal profit to individual concerns, and the sanctity of contract.

Taken as a whole, the MacMillan report would avoid stabilization at "approximately the present level," and recognizes their vital interest to be that the price level be not raised above the point they desire it. And it seems clear to me that this control by England represents a power that will not surrender, based on the oratory of a world conference. It must be captured from her on the economic chessboard.

Now, it seems to me that by going to a conference controlled by Great Britain, where the interest of Great Britain is to maintain low commodity prices, we are defeating our own purpose, because our only hope of maintaining our credit structure is to maintain commodity prices high in terms of gold.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. ARENTZ]. [Applause.]

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak in favor of this resolution and speak but briefly upon it during the five minutes at my disposal, far too short a time to touch on the salient points of the silver question, let alone discuss them.

Mr. Speaker, the consideration of this resolution to-day is the result of months and months of laborious work on the part of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, presided over so splendidly by Mr. SOMERS of New York, who has taken up this subject with such earnestness. The hearings before that committee comprise some of the most vital information that this Congress has obtained for years on the monetary question, and its bearing on domestic and international trade, foreign exchange, credits, flight of capital, and the need for broadening the base of the metallic reserves of the world. The uppermost idea before that committee has been the consideration of plans by means of which commodity prices might be stabilized, that would stabilize international exchange, and if and in what manner silver was an influencing factor. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] was right when he said there is no more important subject before the American people than these two questions. We are considering this resolution to-day because these hearings, carried on by Mr. SOMERS and his subcommittee, indicate that the depreciation of the price of silver has had a world-wide and disastrous effect, and many persons of high rank in finance and economics who have expressed themselves on the subject consider it one of the major causes of this depression we have experienced since 1929.

I can not for the life of me understand how anyone can conjure up the things that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has conjured up. I have spoken to the President; I have spoken to diplomats, and I have spoken to other men high in the offices of this Government, and they all say with one voice that the conference proposed in this resolution will not include the discussion of reparations and foreign debts, will not even include such items, but will be confined to the discussion of subjects influencing commodity prices, a subject every wage earner, farmer, and manufacturer in the United States is vitally concerned about. The stabilization of silver has an important bearing on this subject. These Government officials believe, as I do, that if you cancel the European debts the only people who can pay them will be the American people, and we are against that.

I am against the payment of European debts by Americans. I do not say that the Europeans are going to pay tomorrow or next day, but they will ultimately have to pay; but the subject in its entirety is taboo at the proposed conference, as far as the American spokesmen are concerned.

What does this resolution do? This resolution provides that the European countries and the American representatives will sit around a table and discuss monetary and economic questions.

The question was asked as to who is interested in silver. I want to say that the most prominent men in Europe, the most prominent men in England, France, Germany, Italy, and other countries have all expressed the desire that something be done for silver. Many of these men believe, as I do, that the staggering blow dealt silver through the action of man can be cured by man; in fact, must be, before the world can return to any semblance of the 1924–1929 figure, whether figured in commodity prices, percentage of men employed, bank deposits, car loading, or any other indicator of good and bad times.

This conference of the nations of the world who meet to discuss general economic and monetary conditions can find many subjects of importance because the world, from an economic or monetary point of view, is sadly out of order.

In their discussion of economics and silver I refer each member to the conference to the printed hearings of the Somers committee. They can help silver by helping themselves, without disturbing their present monetary system. I suggest that they first reestablish the fineness of their subsidiary coinage and prevent further debasement below 0.925 fine. This applies to most European countries. Next, Great Britain could remove the threat of hundreds of millions of ounces of silver in India being dumped on the world market by following the advice of some of her ablest counsellors—by repealing certain laws and placing India back on a silver basis. England's leaders could do this by a stroke of a pen and start half the people of the world back up the road to prosperity.

Nothing radical about this, but all tending to the increase of trade, stabilizing of commodity prices, and a leveling down of the great variation in foreign exchange.

During the discussion of monetary conditions the American delegates must offer the American plan for the use of silver as a metallic reserve alongside of gold in the treasuries of the world. Most monetary experts agree that there is a shortage of gold, an insufficiency in the treasuries of the principal nations of the world to care for credit needs of its people. In addition to this, it is admitted that there is a maldistribution of gold.

Through the use of silver as an auxiliary reserve alongside of gold both these evils may be cured. The plan does not contemplate the fixing of the price of silver by any ratio to that of gold but merely the stabilization of the price through its use in the form of bullion, as a reserve the same as gold, without disturbing the latter, and the issue of certificates against the silver bullion which have printed across their face "This certifies that there has been deposited in the treasury of (the name of country) ——— dollars in silver."

I regret that time does not permit me to discuss this important subject at this time. I am in favor of the resolution and hope it passes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule the previous question is ordered on the resolution. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. McFADDEN) there were—ayes 83, noes 5.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum, and object to the vote on that ground.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently there is not a quorum present.

The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 237, nays 24,, answered "present" 1, not voting 168, as follows:

PROHIBITION

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a copy of a letter I have written on the subject of the prohibition amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, under the leave granted by the unanimous consent of the House, I wish to include in the RECORD an expression of my views on the subject of the right of the people to determine what shall be our national policy with respect to the question of prohibition, and their right to make such changes in the Constitution as may be necessary to effect their will. My views on this matter have been set forth in a letter addressed by me to Rev. James K. Shields, superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League of New Jersey, reading as follows:

REV. JAMES K. SHIELDS,
Superintendent Anti-Saloon League of New Jersey,
Newark, N. J.

DEAR DOCTOR SHIELDS: A careful reading of your letter of March 12, 1932, addressed to me and given publication throughout the State, indicates that you have utterly failed to appreciate that honesty and sincerity of purpose, as characterized my vote in the House of Representatives on March 14, 1932, could exist because my action was not in entire accord with your viewpoint and opinion.

Your letter assumes that because of the position I have taken, namely, that "the people be given an opportunity to express their opinion as to what shall be our governmental policy on the question of prohibition," I have thereby been unfaithful to those who, by their votes, have made it possible for me to serve the first district of New Jersey in the House of Representatives.

The attitude you have taken is evidently based upon the thought that there was an obligation upon my part to oppose any movement that would permit an expression of opinion upon the prohibition question.

The right of the people to govern is an established American principle. A government "of the people, by the people, and for the people" is the ideal to which we aspire. How can there be such a government if the people are denied the right to express in a constitutional way their individual thought and opinion on great questions?

Never has there been an indication that I would not give the fullest allegiance to this principle of government; nor has any encouragement ever been given, directly or indirectly, to any individual, group, or organization that I would refuse by my vote to give the fullest expression to this principle, and my action in supporting the motion to discharge the committee of House Joint Resolution 208 and thereby place the question before the people for decision, was a recognition of the right and justice of the principle that all government should be based upon "the consent of the governed." No apology is ever necessary for upholding that principle.

In supporting the motion, my action was in entire accord with the procedure that had made the enactment of the eighteenth amendment an accomplished fact; and, furthermore, neither was my vote, nor the views I expressed as to the reason therefor, nor the principles upon which it was based, in any way at variance with the course of action or the reasoning of Senator SHEPPARD, author of the eighteenth amendment, when that amendment was before the Senate of the United States for submission to the several States in 1917.

With reference to the fundamental right of the States to have an opportunity to pass upon changes to the Constitution and determine the relative powers of the Federal and State Governments, Senator SHEPPARD, in addressing the Senate on July 30, 1917, and urging the submission of the proposed amendment to the States, said:

"One of the highest forms of State rights under the Constitution is the right of the States, acting through three-fourths of their number, to change, add to, or take from the powers and functions of the Federal Government, or to pass upon the advisability of so doing. If when the States pass upon the prohibition amendment, three-fourths can not be found to favor it, their constitutional function will have been exercised, and their action will be final until proper time arrives for another trial. Until, however, they are permitted to judge its merits, they will have been deprived of one of their most fundamental capacities." (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 65th Cong., 1st sess., p. 5553.)

And now with respect to what should be the attitude of Members of Congress in voting for or against the submission of proposed amendments to the Constitution. The question has been raised as to the right, duty, or justification of a Member of Congress in voting to submit any amendment to the States for decision, unless he be in accord with such amendment; and the inference is made that if the Member of Congress does not fully approve of such amendment, then there is an obligation to oppose its submission.

This is no new question. It called for decision when the eighteenth amendment was proposed for submission to the States in 1917. Senator SHEPPARD, as he earnestly advocated the submission of the amendment to the States, answered the question upon a basis of reasoning that is just as forceful to-day as when he uttered it July 30, 1917, and just as applicable to the proposed amendment before the House of Representatives on March 14 last as to the original amendment. He said:

"The Member of Congress who will not vote for the submission of a constitutional amendment to the decision of the States, where it belongs, unless he personally believes it should become a part of the Constitution, usurps the function of the States, arrogates to himself and to the Federal Government a prerogative that belongs to the States, and violates the very essence of their sovereignty." (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 65th Cong., 1st sess., p. 5553.)

Furthermore, it was not only the opinion but the firm conviction of Senator SHEPPARD that a distinct obligation was created upon the part of Members of Congress to recognize the desire of considerable numbers of our people when petitioning for submission of a proposed amendment to the Constitution. He said:

"Over 12,000,000 of the American people have petitioned Congress to submit the prohibition amendment to the States. In refusing these people the right to appeal to the only tribunal having the power of amendment, the tribunal of the States, for the redress of what they consider one of the most terrible grievances in the Republic, Congress would deny to them one of the most sacred of all popular rights—the right of petition. Were I opposed on principle to nation-wide prohibition, I would vote to submit the amendment to the States in order that they might exercise one of their fundamental rights. An issue is thus presented by the nation-wide amendment entirely independent of prohibition, and that issue is expressed in two questions:

"(1) Shall Senators and Representatives in Congress wholly or partly substitute themselves for the States as the amending power of the Constitution, thereby centralizing sovereignty at Washington to a degree threatening the extinction of the State?

"(2) Shall they refuse the people the right of petition?" (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 65th Con., 1st sess., p. 5553.)

This forceful and unanswerable presentation by Senator SHEPPARD of the right of the people when based upon petition comes with peculiar force and applicability to the situation presented in the House of Representatives on March 14, 1932, when, by reason of a petition signed by 145 Members of the House, representing approximately 40,000,000 people, action upon the proposed amendment became compulsory under the rules of the House; and certain it is that no one can properly deny that if the course proposed by Senator SHEPPARD to be the duty of Members of Congress was right in 1917 it was right and proper for myself and others of like opinion in 1932 to support the motion that would permit the States to decide as to the advisability of adopting the proposed amendment, and to do so without any violation of our own individual thought and opinion on the subject of prohibition with relationship to the eighteenth amendment.

What stronger or more convincing language could be used to justify the course taken by me on March 14 than that of Senator SHEPPARD, author of the eighteenth amendment, as he closed his appeal on July 30, 1917, to the Senate of the United States to submit the amendment to the States? He said:

"At the close of this debate we will have an opportunity to enable the States to exercise their highest function—the right to shape, alter, and develop the Federal Constitution. They are the proper tribunal to decide the fate of this amendment. They compose the mightiest array of free commonwealths united in a federated whole the world has ever seen. There are chapters in the history of each that add honor to American citizenship. If there is anything in the amendment subversive of their liberties and their welfare, they can be trusted to condemn it. Let not Congress assume to judge for them. Let Congress discharge its preliminary task of submission and stand aside. Let it put in motion the referendum provided by the Nation's organic law—the method of amendment the States themselves established when they created the Constitution. Let the States perform the duty which remains the sole instance of their sovereignty over the Federal Government itself. If the State and Nation may each retain the attributes contemplated in the Constitution; if each shall be kept within its sphere and permitted to perform its appointed agency—the most beneficent system of government yet devised will be strengthened and glorified for all time."

Continuing, and with these words, Senator SHEPPARD concluded his speech:

"As I view the matter, the Member of either branch of the American Congress who denies the power of amendment to the States, especially an amendment which vast numbers of the people desire the States to consider, violates the basic principles both of the Constitution and of popular government, repudiates the fundamental rights of the States, and overturns the two most sacred privileges the people possess, the privileges of referendum and of petition." (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 65th Cong., 1st sess., p. 5554.)

This statement of fundamental principles is sound. Its fulfillment gives strength and permanency to our structure of government. It is a safe guide for all time.

It was this recognition of the real principle involved that gave strength to the appeal of those favoring the submission of the eighteenth amendment to the States in 1917. The voice of every advocate of the policy of submission in Senate and House was raised in defense of the principle, "the right of the people to decide."

Senator JONES, of the State of Washington, another outspoken friend of the eighteenth amendment, both then and now, in his speech before the Senate on July 31, 1917, likewise urged his colleagues that it was their duty to vote to submit the proposed amendment to the people, no matter what their views upon the merits of the prohibition question might be. He said:

"Shall the people rule? That was the political slogan of a great party a few years ago. Although I did not belong to that party I believed in the truth interrogatively declared by that slogan. There could be no difference of opinion about it.

"I may be wrong, but as I see it the real issue before the Senate now is whether we as representatives of the people will give them a chance to express themselves upon a great question in which they are vitally interested and upon which they alone can act. In other words, Mr. President, the real question presented to the Senate upon this joint resolution is: 'Shall the people rule?'"

Continuing, he said:

"I can vote to give them that right, no matter what my views upon the merits of the prohibition question may be; nor do I think that I am shirking any responsibilities in doing so.

"The Constitution provides the way for its amendment. Congress can not do it, but it can propose amendments to the people, who alone can adopt them through their State legislatures. I believe it to be my duty as a Senator to vote to submit an amendment to the State legislatures when there is a strong, matured, widespread sentiment and demand from the people for such an amendment. To refuse to do so is to act as the master rather than as the representative of the people." (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 65th Cong., 1st sess., p. 5587.)

Even at this late day the friends of prohibition do not forget the splendid service in that cause rendered by Commander Richmond P. Hobson, hero of Santiago, afterwards Member of Congress from the State of Alabama, and often spoken of as the coauthor with Senator SHEPPARD of the eighteenth amendment. In urging favorable consideration of a resolution to submit the amendment to the people, he said, before the House Committee on the Judiciary, April 15, 1914 (Hearings, ser. 6, pts. 1, 2, pp. 19, 20), the following:

"The first matter that I desire to bring to your attention is that the memorial or petition is for a referendum. It is not the purpose of those who are here to-day to enter into any lengthy discussion of the question of the merits of prohibition or the differences in the various forms of temperance legislation, but to have you realize that the request is for the several States, or the people in the several States as a whole, to be allowed to pass on that question. It is a form of referendum provided in the Constitution of the United States to produce changes in the organic law of the land. Now, irrespective of the merits of the measure, the spirit of our institutions is that a majority of our people have the right to decide organic questions—that is, a majority of the people in the several States have the right to decide any organic questions."

And then, continuing his remarks, he emphasized the fact that "Congress should at the earliest possible moment wash its hands" of the question and put it where it belongs—to the States for ratification or rejection. He said:

"Then our position before the House of Representatives will be that, irrespective of the individual ideas of Members of Congress on the merits of the case, Congress ought to put it up to the people of the several States, a majority of those people in due form having requested to be allowed to pass on it. At this juncture I desire to call the attention of the chairman and members of the committee to this consideration without arguing it: This is an organic question; it deals with life and death, with liberty, wth the survival of individuals, of groups, of nations, of empires, and of civilization, and we submit that the true treatment of an organic disease must be an organic treatment; that Congress can not treat this question comprehensively and completely, and that it is only the people in the several States who can apply the organic treatment. We submit that Congress should at the earliest moment wash its hands of this question and put it where it can no longer disturb the political forces in the matter of the election of Members of Congress to the lower or upper House; that both of those Houses should recognize the propriety of permitting the people in the several States to apply this organic treatment and then allow the forces for and against it to go out into the several States and settle it among the people themselves. So if you want to solve this question, there is only one way to solve it right, and it will never be solved until we do solve it in the right way. We ought to put this up to the States for ratification."

And now, I call to your attention the views expressed by prominent members of the Anti-Saloon League of America as to the duty of Members of Congress with respect to the submission of a proposed amendment, and emphasizing again the fact that a vote for submission is not to be construed as necessarily reflecting the individual viewpoint of the Member of Congress on the proposed amendment he votes to submit.

The following is a statement of Rev. Edwin C. Dinwiddie, who at the time (May 1, 1914) was appearing before a subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee. He presented himself to the committee as legislative superintendent of the National Anti-Saloon League, International Order of Good Templars, superintendent bureau of information of National Interchurch Temperance Federation, etc. He said, as appears in the hearings of the committee, Sixty-third Congress, second session, page 125:

"In the second place, I raise the question, What are we asking Congress to do in this matter? What is Congress asked to do in relation to this proposed amendment? The answer is, we are simply asking Congress, under the provision of the Constitution, to submit to the people of the various States this amendment for their ratification or rejection. As I take it, the report of this amendment, with the recommendation of this committee, and its ultimate passage by the Senate and the House, do not commit any individual Senator to this proposition. He can vote, as a citizen of his State, as he chooses when it comes to a final decision on the question, when submitted to the various States for approval or rejection. In other words, we are simply asking that Congress, under the terms of the Constitution, give the people a chance to vote on this proposition by a referendum through their State legislatures. Congress, therefore, is not asked to pass on the policy of prohibition or nonprohibition, license, or no license."

The duty of Congress to recognize the right of the people to express their views on any great question when demanded by any considerable number was clearly and tersely stated by Rev. Dr. James Cannon, jr., of Richmond, Va., representing the Methodist Episcopal Church South, superintendent of Virginia Anti-Saloon League, and a member of the national executive committee of the Anti-Saloon League. Bishop Cannon on April 16, 1914, before the subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee (hearings, 63d Cong., 2d sess., p. 13) said:

"It does seem to me that in view of the general trend of political thought in our day, whenever it becomes evident that a large percentage of the people desire an opportunity to express themselves upon a great question, the body in whose hands is committed the right to decide whether the people shall have that opportunity could at least divide the responsibility with the people as to the decision of that question."

In each case the basic principle recognized by those to whom I have referred is "the right of the people to decide." If additional verification were necessary to further prove the propriety of giving the fullest expression to this fundamental right of our people, it would be possible to draw upon the statements of those who have been outstanding in our legislative halls, both National and State, and thoughtful and worth-while citizens in every walk and station of life, including the church.

In fact, it was only in January last, a few days after Bishop Richardson, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, had been elected as head of the Anti-Saloon League of America, that the Philadelphia Inquirer and other daily newspapers carried the story, under a Washington headline, dated January 18, stating:

"Confident of the result, Bishop Ernest G. Richardson looks upon the polls of the voters by the various States as the best means of settling the issue of repeal of the eighteenth amendment."

In this article Bishop Richardson is quoted as having said:

"When a majority of the people in three-fourths of the States favor repeal of the amendment, then let it go. That's the only constitutional way to proceed."

I bring to your attention this reported interview of Bishop Richardson not only as confirmation of my statement that "worthwhile citizens in every walk and station of life, including the church," believe in the right of the people to express their views in a constitutional way, but also to indicate how unwarrantable, improper, and uncharitable, if not unchristian, was your inference in the concluding part of your letter that recognition of such principle by me would receive only the approbation of "vice vendors, gamblers, and the entire underworld." A spirit of tolerence for the opinion of others, even though you may not agree with them, would have been far more becoming to one who occupies so sacred a calling as do you.

The fact which you state in your letter, that the opponents of the eighteenth amendment did not assist those favoring the submission of that amendment and therefore have no right to expect the friends of that amendment to assist to-day in a movement seeking to ascertain the will of the people at this time, is neither logical nor indicative of sound reasoning, if the question is to be considered from the standpoint of fundamental principles of government.

Logical reasoning encourages the thought that if those who opposed the submission of the eighteenth amendment to the people in 1917 were wrong in theory and principle, as set forth by Senator SHEPPARD and the officials of the Anti-Saloon League in that day, then it necessarily follows that those who oppose the same right of the people to-day are equally wrong. And if those who favored the submission of the eighteenth amendment to the people were right in their claim that this is a Government of the people, and therefore the people had a right to speak on the subject, then the conclusion is irresistible that the same right exists to-day and that you are wrong in your criticism of those who, like myself, have by their vote on March 14 followed the reasoning and acknowledged the principle previously laid down by those who were entitled to speak for your organization. Consistency, as well as recognition of a sound principle, indicates, in my opinion, your duty to favor rather than oppose this great principle that made possible the enactment of the eighteenth amendment.

Basic principles of our Government do not change. Individuals may seek to apply these principles at different times in different ways, as best suits the purpose they wish to serve; but the principle itself is unchangeable and remains inviolate. In the end, the best interests of our country and the welfare of its people will be better served by a recognition of the right and justice of such a fundamental principle as "the right of the people to decide," and our structure of government will thereby be made more permanent and secure.

The deep, underlying question presented in 1917, and again in 1932, to Congress for action was identical in principle; and the decision Members of Congress were called upon to make was no different on March 14, 1932, than on August 1, 1917, when, quoting the words of Senator SHEPPARD:

"An issue is thus presented by the nation-wide amendment entirely independent of prohibition, and that issue is expressed in two questions:

"(1) Shall Senators and Representatives in Congress either wholly or partly substitute themselves for the States as the amending power of the Constitution, thereby centralizing sovereignty at Washington to a degree threatening the extinction of the State?

"(2) Shall they refuse the people the right of petition?"

The action of individual Members of Congress, who, in recognition of this larger issue, voted on March 14 to submit the question to the States, in many instances of my own personal knowledge set aside their individual views on the question of prohibition to the higher duty of respecting the right of the States through their citizens to determine the fundamental policies of our Government.

The fact that the eighteenth amendment, fixing our governmental policy with respect to prohibition, was submitted to the States in 1917, and subsequently ratified, does not preclude the right of the States, quoting again the words of Senator Sheppard, "to shape, alter, and develop the Federal Constitution," and that right prevails in 1932 as it did in 1917.

There is no more reason or justice in denying the inherent right of submission to our States of proposed changes in the Constitution on the theory that the question was settled in 1917, than to have said in 1917, in answer to the demand for submission, that the matter was settled when our forefathers did not include the provisions in the Constitution originally.

The principle of the right of the people to decide did not die or become obsolete or unnecessary with the enactment of the eighteenth amendment. It is a living principle. It is part and parcel of the life of our Nation. It will live as long as the Constitution survives, and will always claim the respect and allegiance of thoughtful citizens who think in terms of the welfare of the Nation.

And we must never fail to realize that the Constitution is likewise a living document, and that our permanency as a nation is promoted when, in the manner provided by that great document, its provisions are made responsive to the expressed will of the people.

The Member of Congress who stands in the way of giving the fullest opportunity for the expression of the will of our people on great fundamental questions, where demand is made therefor in conformity with the method provided by the Constitution, and permits his own individual opinion to preclude others with a different opinion from having the right to express themselves, is, in the words of that great friend of the prohibition movement, Senator JONES, acting "as the master rather than as the representative of the people."

My belief in and allegiance to that principle of government that gives to every citizen, no matter what his station in life may be, the right to express his own individual opinion on fundamental policies, is no new conviction on my part.

In 1915, as a member of the New Jersey House of Assembly, speaking in behalf of the adoption of a local-option measure, giving to citizens the right to voice their sentiment, I said:

"I have no apologies to make to anyone for advocating a measure that is based on the American principle of majority rule. It is a right of the people to have an opportunity to express themselves on the question of prohibition. I have confidence and faith in the judgment of the American people. I shall therefore vote for the bill."

In each of the succeeding years that I had the honor of membership in the house of assembly I supported such legislation until in 1918 it was finally enacted into law.

This truly American principle of government—the right of the people to decide—recognizes the equality of every citizen and gives no one any greater right than another in formulating the policies of our Government. It gives strength and security to our structure of government, because it is based on the "consent of the governed."

To-day I stand as I did then, a firm believer in the right of the people; and if I have not truly and with high purpose represented the will of the people of the first district of New Jersey in this great matter, then, if they so decreed, I could leave the Halls of Congress with that sense of satisfaction that comes from the inner consciousness that I have done the thing I believed to be right. I am,

Most sincerely,

CHAS. A. WOLVERTON.

SALARIES OF POSTMASTERS AND OTHER POSTAL EMPLOYEES

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, it is respectfully submitted that the inclusion of third and fourth class postmasters in the wage reduction bill will have a demoralizing effect on the Postal Service in the smaller towns and villages of the country, in view of the fact that compensation and salaries there are now suffering reductions greatly in excess of those proposed. The compensation of these postmasters is based entirely on the amount of postal receipts at third-class offices and on stamps canceled at fourth-class offices, which have decreased alarmingly for the past two years, resulting in very large reductions in the compensation of these groups. To include these groups in a further reduction would be discriminatory and unjust, as shown by the facts and figures submitted herewith.

On July 1, 1931, 4,681 first, second, and third class postmasters were reduced an amount aggregating $575,900. Of this number, 3,939 were third class and suffered a reduction in salaries aggregating $485,600, with an estimated reduction in clerical allowance amounting to $437,040, a total reduction sustained by third class for the fiscal year 1932 amounting to $922,640.

On July 1, 1932, 6,852 postmasters will be reduced in salary $909,000. Basing the experience of the third class on that of the fiscal year 1932, 5,521 third class will be further reduced $766,400, with estimated clerical allowances reduced $688,760.

Summary of reductions of third-class postmasters, first years 1932–33

	Salaries reduced	Aggregate salary reductions	Estimated clerical reductions
July 1, 1931	3,939	$485,600	$437,040
July 1, 1932	5,251	766,400	689,760
	9,190	1,251,000	1,126,800

As a further evidence of the declining postal receipts and their effects upon the salaries and classification of post offices, on July 1, 1931, 283 third-class offices were relegated to the fourth class and on July 1, 1932, 583 third class will be relegated to the lower class.

Schedule of receipts upon which salaries are based

Receipts	Third-class salary, postmaster	Clerical allowance
$1,500 but less than $1,600	$1,100	$240
$1,600 but less than $1,700	1,200	330
$1,700 but less than $1,900	1,300	420
$1,900 but less than $2,100	1,400	510
$2,100 but less than $2,400	1,500	600
$2,400 but less than $2,700	1,600	690
$2,700 but less than $3,000	1,700	780
$3,000 but less than $3,500	1,800	870
$3,500 but less than $4,200	1,900	960
$4,200 but less than $5,000	2,000	1,050
$5,000 but less than $6,000	2,100	1,140
$6,000 but less than $7,000	2,200	1,400
$7,000 but less than $8,000	2,300	1,600

From this schedule it can be seen that a small decrease will reduce the postmaster to a lower salary grade, automatically reducing the clerical allowance. For example, a decrease of $500 receipts in a calendar year will reduce the $1,400 salaried postmaster to $1,100; clerical allowance to $240; a total reduction of $570. The decrease of $1,100 receipts in the higher salary grade will reduce the salary of the postmaster $200 and the clerical allowance $460; a total of $660.

Postmasters of the fourth class are paid commissions on stamps canceled and are already receiving depression wages. It is estimated that business in these offices has decreased 20 per cent, and the postmasters' compensation a like amount.

Summarizing: Third-class offices for the fiscal years 1932 and 1933 have suffered 9,190 reductions, aggregating $2,377,000 and 826 relegations. No other group has been so severely affected.

In view of the facts herewith submitted, and the reason that district postmasters, third and fourth classes, have suffered reductions in excess of those proposed in the bill of a flat 10 per cent reduction, I urge that they be excluded from further wage cuts.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank Mr. E. A. Meeks, president of the National League of District Postmasters, for the data just quoted by me.

President Meeks collaborated with me in the preparation of the statement I have just made, and I wish to state that the postmasters and other postal employees of the whole Nation are indebted to him for the splendid service he is rendering them. He has their every interest at heart and is ever present and doing his very best for them when their rights are involved in any way, in the Nation's Capital or elsewhere.

PROHIBITION

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on Joint Resolution 427, which I introduced, which proposes a constitutional amendment providing for a direct constitutional referendum on the eighteenth amendment, and provides a method by which such referendum can be secured.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, on the 10th of June I introduced House Joint Resolution No. 427, which proposes a constitutional amendment providing for a direct constitutional referendum on the eighteenth amendment and provides a method by which such referendum can be secured.

I find in every part of the country people in all classes feel that the prohibition question in the United States should be reconsidered. They feel that the voters should have a direct vote on the question; that they should have the right by popular vote to decide whether or not the present system should be continued.

I also find that nine out of every ten who advocate that the eighteenth amendment be repealed or amended are against the open saloon, and most of them favor a Federal dispensary system similar to the Canadian system.

Under our Constitution the Congress of the United States can not submit this question to the people for a direct vote, and before a direct vote can be had on this question it will be necessary to amend the Constitution, and for that reason I have introduced House Joint Resolution No. 427, which if passed by a two-thirds vote of both Houses and ratified by the required number of States, will give the voters a direct vote on the question.

Under my proposed amendment, at the first general election occurring at least five months after its ratification, a referendum is to be held in each State on the question whether the present eighteenth amendment shall be replaced by the substitute submitted to the electorate.

It authorizes a direct vote on the question and will give an equal opportunity to every legal voter. The referendum vote would automatically follow the adoption of the amendment at the next congressional election in every State and would not make any additional expense except possibly for the printing of the ballots.

If the substitute is favorably acted upon, the existing absolute prohibition under the eighteenth amendment will be modified so that Congress may authorize the liquor traffic in States where it is desired. Under the substitute each State will have the power to decide, by act of its legislature or by a referendum, whether or not the system provided by Congress under the new amendment shall be operative within the State. If a State desires the system of control to be extended to it, the separate political subdivisions of that State may still, by referendum, determine for themselves whether or not the system shall apply to them.

Under the substitute amendment Congress has absolute control over the manufacture, importation, exportation, and transportation of intoxicating beverages. Congress likewise has very extensive control over the sale of such beverages. The saloon is absolutely prohibited and Congress may not authorize sales except in packages under a system of governmental permits and regulations. The exercise of the authority granted Congress is protected from abuse by the power of Congress to provide for penalties for violations of the laws providing for the system.

Under section 2 the proposed amendment to the eighteenth amendment will not become operative unless a majority of all the electors in all the States favor it, and, of course, unless a majority of the electors in each of three-fourths of the several States approve of the substitute. This section allows referenda to be held in those States which do not approve the amendment at the first referendum at like elections held separately within five years. After the expiration of that time, if the substitute has not been ratified by referenda in 36 States or by a majority of the electors in the United States, final ratification will be impossible.

Section 3 requires that persons voting at the referenda shall have the same qualifications as are required for voting for members of the most numerous branch of the State legislature (the same requirements as apply to voting for Members of Congress).

Section 4 provides that the State election laws as to the method of submitting the question and determining the result shall apply to the referenda. Where there is no applicable State law the Congress may by law provide for these matters.

Since there is no existing provision in the Constitution authorizing a constitutional amendment to be ratified by referenda, it is necessary that this amendment itself be ratified as required now by the Constitution. When this amendment is ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States and then written into the Constitution, constitutional authority is given to proceed to put into operation the machinery provided in the amendment for determining whether the substitute eighteenth amendment will be adopted.

Section 5 contains the usual provision that this proposed amendment shall be inoperative unless ratified within seven years.

Under the resolution I have introduced the voters will have the right to choose between the present system and a definite, concrete alternative system—a system that has been adopted in other countries as the best alternative system when they voted against absolute prohibition. Both sides will have an opportunity to present their side of the question. An educational campaign can be carried on by both sides, and the prohibition question, which to-day is the most bitter controversial question in the history of the Nation, can be settled by a direct vote of the people.

In my opinion, before the eighteenth amendment can ever be repealed or amended it will be necessary to place before the voters of the country a definite plan by which it is proposed that drinks with an alcoholic content can be procured.

Canada tried prohibition but did not find it satisfactory. Since 1921 seven Provinces have abandoned prohibition for regulatory systems, and, if I am correctly informed, only two Provinces retain prohibition.

In Canada over 90 per cent of the population live in the Provinces allowing liquor under Government regulation. While the systems in the different Provinces are not the same, in all the Provinces there is a Government monopoly of liquor and a complete elimination of private profit in the manufacture and sale of liquor.

Ontario, in which conditions are possibly more like the United States than any of the others, abandoned prohibition in 1927. After abandoning prohibition it set up Government stores in cities and towns, where liquors of guaranteed quality are sold at fixed prices, and they claim excessive drinking has been curbed under this system. The purchaser must have a permit, as a resident, which costs $2 a year. On this permit purchases are entered. If anyone is found to be drinking excessively, or if a complaint is made by one of his family, his purchases can be restricted or his privilege of purchase canceled.

Under this system there has been a notable decline in the consumption of hard liquor per capita. Not only has the consumption of hard liquor declined but Canada has made a good thing of liquor in terms of revenue.

It is said that the consumption of hard liquor is declining in every country in the world except in the United States, the one Nation that still retains prohibition.

Temperance has been realized more fully in the countries that have instituted a plan for regulation which discourages consumption without prohibiting it. For that reason people in every part of the country are demanding that the prohibition question be reconsidered and that they be given a direct vote on the question, and it is for that reason that I have introduced House Joint Resolution No. 427.

The resolution is as follows:

[H. J. Res. 427, in the House of Representatives, Seventy-second Congress, first session]

Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing for a referendum on a proposed substitute for the eighteenth amendment

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States:

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. Each State shall submit to the electors thereof at the next general election at which Representatives in Congress are elected in such State, after five months from the ratification of this article, the question whether or not the eighteenth amendment to this Constitution shall be amended to read as follows:

"'ARTICLE XVIII

"'SECTION 1. The manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from, the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited, except as provided in section 2 of this article.

"'SEC. 2. Congress shall by appropriate legislation authorize the manufacture, importation, exportation, and transportation of intoxicating beverages, and the sale thereof in packages under a system of governmental permits and regulations, and shall provide penalties for violations of such laws and of permits and regulations prescribed pursuant to such laws. Laws granting such authority shall apply within any State or Territory, and within any political subdivision of a State or Territory, only when the application thereof within such State, Territory, or political subdivision is requested, in the case of a State or Territory by an act of the legislature thereof, or by a referendum vote of the electors thereof, and in the case of a political subdivision by a referendum vote of the electors thereof. Neither Congress nor any State, Territory, or possession shall have power to permit or authorize the conduct of a saloon; and it shall be unlawful for any person conducting a saloon to manufacture, transport, possess, or sell intoxicating liquors for any purpose.'

"SEC. 2. If a majority of all the electors so voting thereon shall favor the amendment set forth in this article, and if a majority of such electors in each of three-fourths of the several States shall have likewise voted for such amendment at such election, or at like elections held separately by States within five years after such election, the eighteenth amendment shall be amended as set forth in this article.

"SEC. 3. The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature.

"SEC. 4. Each State shall submit such question to its electors and determine the result of any election under this article as the law thereof provides, or, in the absence of such State law, in such manner as the Congress shall by law provide.

"SEC. 5. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of the several States, as provided in the Constitution, within seven years from the date of the submission hereof to the States by the Congress."

MEMORIALS

Mr. MOREHEAD. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the Memorial Committee, I desire to call the Members' attention to the fact that the time for printing those memorials will expire on the 27th of this month. Also, Mr. Speaker, I would like to have unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD on the late lamented Speaker Longworth.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will not the gentleman state also that all Members have permission to extend memorials on any deceased Member referred to in the proceedings, and in connection with that that under the resolution adopted every Member was granted five days after the close of the session to extend those memorials?

Mr. MOREHEAD. I had notice from the Printing Committee that they were proceeding to get out the RECORD, and that the time would expire on the 27th of June. Permission was granted to all Members to extend their remarks in memorials until the close of the session, but the committee have notified me that the time would expire on the 27th of June.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

TO RELIEVE UNEMPLOYMENT AND DISTRESS

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks on House Joint Resolution 67, introduced by me December 8, concerning unemployment and economic distress.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, before we adjourn we must pass some suitable measure of relief against unemployment and distress. Even if we be forced to endure July heat in Washington, that is a thousand times better than that millions should suffer next winter for food and fuel. We must pass such a bill, even if the President should dare to veto it.

Never before in the history of America were conditions as distressing and as demoralizing as they are now. It is worse than Valley Forge. The blight of depression struck America almost as suddenly as a cyclone. It has carried everything down in front of it. Agriculture first caught the blow. Prices of cotton, wheat, corn, and other farm products are lower than in the history of man. Land, the source of all life, that from which all that we eat and all that we wear originally comes, can not bear the present burden of taxation. Industrial stocks are almost valueless.

Banks by the thousands have gone down since 1929, carrying billions of deposits and leaving millions of innocent and industrious people in distress. Railroads are in the hands of receivers, even insurance companies are anxious about their assets, and now policyholders wonder what will be the outcome. At least 8,000,000 wage earners are out of employment, and that means that about 40,000,000 people are on the verge of starvation. Yet all this with the largest crops, the most efficient factories, the best transportation system, the largest number of banks, and the biggest insurance companies of any nation in the world. What is the reason?

THE CAUSE OF OUR GRIEF

This is due simply to the paralysis of commerce. The exchange of labor and commodities has ceased. The first death blow was struck by the Republican superhigh prohibition tariff of 1929. Under the name of protection, it accomplished prohibition of international commerce. Instead of protecting American business and labor, it has completely destroyed them. It stopped the exportation of cotton and destroyed the price of cotton. The great bull stock market, the most gigantic and colossal game of speculation in the history of the whole world, was the second and finishing body blow, and brought death to American business. Both these causes are the direct sins of an unbridled, unreasoning, and greedy Republican majority which came into power March 4, 1929. It was arrogant in its defiance of agriculture and labor, and contemptuous of the average man, and obeyed to the letter the voice of its master, which is big, selfish, greedy business and grasping international bankers and conscienceless speculators.

FIRST DIRECT RELIEF MEASURE

We had a mild winter, beginning in December, 1930, and as I lay in the hospital in the summer of 1931, I dared not hope that we would have a mild winter follow immediately. Consequently I outlined in my mind what I deemed necessary relief legislation to meet the emergency, to prevent people from starving and freezing, and to give employment to as many as possible, to help the States to carry on their public road construction and other public improvement work, and to empower somebody with responsibility and authority to meet any crisis and any emergency, however grave, that might arise.

FIRST STEP FOR RELIEF

Accordingly, on December 8, 1931, I introduced House Joint Resolution 67, to create a national emergency board, with the power centralized in one man with authority to raise $2,000,000,000 on the credit of the United States, and to commandeer property, or to commandeer the use of property in the interest of the people to prevent suffering and hunger and death. This board was to have the right and duty to cooperate with State agencies and to lend money to the States without any security and on the credit of the States at only 2 per cent per annum for 10 years.

It also was to have the power to lend money to political subdivisions of States at the same rate of interest, which would include counties, school districts, townships, and municipalities. Said national emergency board was to help carry on the Federal public-buildings program by financing the construction of Federal buildings and post offices that had been approved by the interdepartmental committee. I quote some of the language of that bill, in order to show that I intended the board to have adequate power to accomplish its purpose:

> It shall be the duty of said national emergency board to use the powers hereby conferred to the fullest extent to assist industry, commerce, and agriculture to resume full activity, and thus to minimize the sufferings incident to said emergency, and to see that no resident of the United States dies from hunger or cold. The said national emergency board shall exercise its power to transport grain, fruits, vegetables, meats, and their food products, cotton and wool and their clothing products, lumber and other building materials from where they are abundant and cheap to where they are needed, and to assist and encourage their use and consumption. For such property as the said board may take and consume, it shall pay the reasonable market value thereof to the owner at the place and time of taking, and for such property as the board may use but return to the owner thereafter, it shall pay the reasonable value of such use, including the actual damages, but not including any consequential or speculative damages.
> In order to prevent profiteering in food, fuel, and clothing the board shall have the power to control priority of shipments over all interstate carriers, to give preference to shipments of those persons, firms, and corporations selling or offering to sell food, fuel, or clothing at a fair and reasonable price, and to give the consuming public in congested centers of population the advantage of low prices prevailing in the agricultural and fuel-producing areas. If necessary, the said board shall commandeer for temporary use for said purpose trains and train crews, coal mines and oil wells, pipe lines and all necessary facilities and accessories. If deemed wise and expedient, the said board may use railroad trains and crews to transport persons from sections of the country wherein cold prevails to the warm southern climates and to return such persons at the end of the cold season. The said board shall have power to construct temporary quarters, and the War Department shall supply such tents, cots, and blankets as the board may require, all of which shall be returned at the end of the emergency.

THE GARNER RELIEF BILL

Recently the distinguished Speaker of the House of Representatives, the Hon. JOHN N. GARNER, of Texas, realizing that it would never do for Congress to adjourn without having taken some action toward relief of unemployment and to prevent further suffering and distress, introduced his bill, which has been passed by the House. The Garner bill not only authorizes the use of $100,000,000 in direct relief but also $2,000,000,000 in public buildings, rivers and harbors, and Army construction.

I supported that bill as a step in the right direction. But, on May 17, I had previously introduced H. R. 12125, a bill to amend the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act so as to authorize it to lend money to industrial or manufacturing corporations so as to keep workers employed and prevent the closing down of factories and mills, and also to lend money to States or school districts so as to cash the warrants for the salaries of school teachers that the States and school districts have been unable to pay. I am glad to say that a part of this proposition is included in the Garner bill, and that substantially the same provision for the lending of money to States and political subdivisions thereof which was carried in my resolution introduced December 8, 1931, is included in the $300,000,000 Wagner bill, recently passed by the Senate. It is my belief that the Garner bill and the Wagner bill will be virtually merged, in conference, so that some adequate and helpful legislation may be worked out for the relief of the people of the Nation.

GREAT POWERS NEEDED TO MEET CRISIS

But I still insisted that the powers of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation are inadequate to meet a crisis that may arise any day, and we should certainly be prepared for any emergency. Consequently, on May 18, 1932, I introduced H. R. 12143, which sought to confer upon the Reconstruction Finance Corporation the very large and ample powers which I contemplated in House Joint Resolution 67, for the board designated by me as the national emergency board. Names are unimportant, but proper powers are all-important. All that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation can do is to lend money to somebody, or to some State, or political subdivision thereof. It should have power to act, and not merely dish out money. I insist that it should have larger powers, so that it can step in as a great national agency, and use the railroads and other transportation facilities, and the operation of coal mines, and of oil wells, and of lumber mills, of flour mills, of meat packers, of drug manufacturers, of clothing manufacturers, of shoe manufacturers, and of all engaged in producing the things necessary to save life and prevent suffering.

I am a great stickler for constitutional authority. I am a life-long disciple of Calhoun. But, in an emergency, the highest constitutional authority is not only the right, but the duty of self-preservation, in any nation. We are now faced with that duty.

In time of war, we have not hesitated to expand and enlarge, temporarily, the powers of the Federal Government. Usually, after war, such powers have been surrendered and the normal balance between the Federal and State Governments resumed.

But we must remember that present conditions are in some respects more serious than war. A nation fights in war to preserve its political independence and integrity. Usually the people of the nation all unite in carrying on a war against a foreign foe. But now it is chaos, disorganization, internal confusion, group against group, class against class, and almost man against man in the desperate struggle for existence.

NEW CONDITIONS CREATE NEW DUTIES

Our Nation has become highly industrialized, and the old individualistic philosophy, based upon a rural population with every plantation self-sufficient, is no longer adequate to meet the requirements of this interdependent and interlocking machine age. It is a far cry from the days of Andrew Jackson, 100 years ago, when the first railroad commenced to operate between Charleston and Hamburg. Since then the Nation is girded with nearly 300,000 miles of steel rails.

The telegraph and telephone lines link every part and corner of the Nation to every other. The automobile and the airplane almost annihilate space and time. And now comes the radio, that knows neither State nor international boundaries, that circles even the globe itself, and makes all mankind one huge community.

In such times as these there must be new and original application of the fundamental doctrines of American life. Hence, I have not hesitated to suggest that it is the Federal Government now that must take the lead in bringing relief in sustaining civilization, in preserving government, and in helping to give a chance to every honest and earnest person, who is willing to work, a job and a chance to live.

NATIONAL PLANNING COUNCIL

It was in accordance with this broad view of our international duty that I introduced, on January 4, 1932, a joint resolution, to empower the President to appoint a nonpartisan board of 25 upstanding and able citizens to constitute a national advisory board, and to plan the ways and means for the recovery of business, industry and agriculture in this Nation. The trouble has been that we have not had proper teamwork.

Each group and class has been desperately struggling alone to preserve itself. But our destinies are all tied up to each other. Certainly, in such a time as this, no man liveth unto himself. Never before was there such need for united action, and cooperative effort. Other bills along this line are pending, and plead and persuade as we would, we have been unable to convince the powers that be that there is help and light and leading along this way.

I shall carry on the fight for the establishment of something like a national advisory board, or a national planning council, or under whatever name it may be placed; we need some body or board or commission of unselfish, patriotic, broad-minded men and women, representing all interests and all sections and all groups, which shall meet frequently and approve any plans and conclusions to submit to the Government, and to the country, for their information and guidance.

THE TEST OF TRUE PATRIOTISM

Surely, now is the time, of all times, to lay aside selfishness, class prejudice, personal ambition, and every motive and consideration, save only service to the people of the Nation. Now patriotism is as much in demand as in war. Now men must give of their strength to serve, just as in war some must give their life. Now there must be teamwork among free citizens, just as there must be cooperation in war among soldiers.

Now the call comes to every American to use brain, heart, and hand to succor the suffering, to encourage the disconsolate, to labor for the common good, and to spare neither time nor strength to restore to every man, woman, and child within the land a chance to labor and to enjoy in full measure the fruit of that labor. This very thing Republican policies have denied to the people. It has overplayed its own game. Intending to serve the selfish small group of special interests, it has well-nigh destroyed both the masses it would exploit and the special classes it sought to enrich. It has killed the goose that laid the golden egg.

For information I am printing a part of H. R. 12143.

A bill to amend an act approved January 22, 1932, designated as Public No. 2, Seventy-second Congress, entitled "An act to provide emergency financing facilities for financial institutions, to aid in financing agriculture, commerce, and industry, and for other purposes"

Be it enacted, etc., That Public Act No. 2, Seventy-second Congress, approved January 22, 1932, entitled "An act to provide emergency facilities for financial institutions, to aid in financing agriculture, commerce, and industry, and for other purposes," be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding a new section after section 17, to be known and designated as section 18, as follows:

"SEC. 18. (a) Said Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall have power to commandeer and take or temporarily to use the property of any person, firm, or corporation, including any or all railroads and any special trains or services of such railroads. Furthermore, said board shall have the right to establish and fix by special order the priority in which shipments may be made, and all such orders shall be respected and obeyed, subject to the claims and penalties hereinafter described.

"(b) The said corporation shall have power to appoint State and local committees as its agents and representatives in carrying out its powers and also to name charity organizations of any State, county, town, or municipality, where the same may be desirable for efficiency, speed, and economy in dispensing relief.

"(c) Said corporation shall have power to lend money to States or to political subdivisions at a rate of interest not exceeding 2 per cent per annum, to be repaid in not exceeding 10 years, said money to be used under the general direction and guidance of said corporation for the building of roads, schoolhouses, educational and other public buildings, and other necessary and proper public works of such States and political subdivisions thereof, and thus to reduce unemployment.

"(d) The said corporation is hereby authorized and empowered to cooperate with the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States in carrying out the existing public-buildings program, and such amendments or additions thereto as shall be made by Congress so as to give employment at the earliest possible moment to the largest possible number of persons, and so as to result in the shipment of large quantities of building materials, and thus to create a demand for labor from the mine, the field, the forest, and other original sources of material.

"(e) This legislation is enacted in view of the national emergency connected with the unemployment of seven or eight millions of persons in this Nation, thus directly affecting the means of subsistence of their dependents to the extent of, perhaps, 40,000,000 persons, and indirectly affecting the entire population of the United States. It shall be the duty of said corporation to use the powers hereby conferred to the fullest extent to assist industry, commerce, and agriculture to resume full activity, and thus to minimize the suffering incident to said emergency, and to see that no residents of the United States die from hunger or cold. The said corporation shall exercise its power to transport grain, fruits, vegetables, meats, and their food products, cotton and wool and their clothing products, lumber and other building materials from where they are abundant and cheap to where they are needed, and to assist and encourage their use and consumption. For such property as the said board may commandeer and take for public relief it shall pay the reasonable market value thereof to the owner at the place and time of taking, and for such property as the board may use but return to the owner thereafter it shall pay the reasonable value of such use, including the actual damages, but not including any consequential or speculative damages. In order to prevent profiteering in food, fuel, and clothing the corporation shall have the power to control priority of shipments over all interstate carriers, to give preference to shipments of those persons, firms, and corporations selling or offering to sell food, fuel, or clothing at a fair and reasonable price, and to give the consuming public in congested centers of population the advantage of low prices prevailing in the agricultural and fuel-producing areas. If necessary, the said corporation shall commandeer for temporary use for said purpose trains and train crews, coal mines and oil wells, pipe lines and all necessary facilities and accessories. If deemed wise and expedient, the said corporation may use railroad trains and train crews to transport persons from sections of the country wherein cold prevails to the warm southern climates and to return such persons at the end of the cold season. The said board shall have power to construct temporary quarters, and the War Department shall supply such tents, cots, and blankets as the board may require, all of which shall be returned at the end of the emergency.

ANTIKIDNAPING BILL FOR DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. THATCHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on a bill I introduced, H. R. 10049, a kidnaping bill, relating to the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. THATCHER. Mr. Speaker, the horrible crimes involved in the kidnaping of the Lindbergh baby focused the attention of the Congress on the subject of enacting legislation which would strengthen existing law. No crime is more monstrous than is this one, especially so when infants and children are the victims. In my judgment, no penalty is too severe for those who perpetrate these unspeakable offenses against society and the home.

INTERSTATE MEASURE

There was introduced in the Senate at this session by Senator PATTERSON, of Missouri, a measure, S. 1525, designed to punish kidnapers and their accessories in the matter of transporting in interstate and foreign commerce any kidnaped person. The same has passed both Houses and has become a law. See Public 189, Seventy-second Congress. It provides as follows:

An act forbidding the transportation of any person in interstate or foreign commerce kidnaped or otherwise unlawfully detained, and making such act a felony

Be it enacted, etc., That whoever shall knowingly transport or cause to be transported or aid or abet in transporting in interstate or foreign commerce any person who shall have been unlawfully seized, confined, inveigled, decoyed, kidnaped, abducted, or carried away by any means whatsoever and held for ransom or reward shall upon conviction be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary for such term of years as the court, in its discretion, shall determine: Provided, That the term "interstate or foreign commerce" shall include transportation from one State, Territory, or the District of Columbia to another State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, or to a foreign country, or from a foreign country to any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia: Provided further, That if two or more persons enter into an agreement, confederation, or conspiracy to violate the provisions of the foregoing act and do any overt act toward carrying out such unlawful agreement, confederation, or conspiracy such person or persons shall be punished in like manner as hereinbefore provided by this act.

This covers the interstate features very well, though I should have been glad to have seen the death penalty included as provided in the companion House measure (H. R. 5657, introduced by Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri), for I believe that the crime is so dastardly and the need for a deterrent so great, that in aggravated cases the severest penalty should be inflicted.

LEGISLATION PROPOSED FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

In making a study as regards the District of Columbia, which is under Federal jurisdiction, I found the law on the subject of kidnaping to be woefully inadequate. Thereupon, I prepared and introduced on March 3, 1932, H. R. 10089, which is of the tenor following:

A bill to amend section 812 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia

Be it enacted, etc., That section 812 of the act entitled "An act to establish a Code of Law for the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1901, as amended (D. C. Code, title 6, sec. 36), is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 812. Whoever shall be guilty of, or of aiding or abetting in, seizing, confining, inveigling, enticing, decoying, kidnaping, abducting, concealing, or carrying away any individual, by any means whatsoever, and holding or detaining, or with the intent to hold or detain, such individual for ransom or reward or for any other unlawful purpose, shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by imprisonment for life or for such term as the court in its discretion may determine; except that in any such case the jury may add to their verdict, if it be guilty, the words 'with the death penalty,' in which case the punishment shall be death by electrocution. This section shall be held to have been violated if either the seizing, confining, inveigling, enticing, decoying, kidnaping, abducting, concealing, carrying away, holding, or detaining occurs in the District of Columbia. If two or more individuals enter into any agreement or conspiracy to do any act or acts which would constitute a violation of the provisions of this section, and one or more of such individuals do any act to effect the object of such agreement or conspiracy, each such individual shall be deemed to have violated the provisions of this section."

The existing law for the District of Columbia on the subject is to be found in section 36, title 6, Code of the District of Columbia, and is as follows:

Abduction: Carrying or decoying beyond District; enticing child under 16 years of age.—Whoever unlawfully and forcibly or fraudulently carries off or decoys out of the District any person, or arrests or imprisons any person with the intention of having such person carried out of the District, shall be imprisoned for not less than one nor more than seven years, or fined not exceeding $1,000, or both: Provided, That whoever leads, carries, or entices away a child under the age of 16 years with the intent unlawfully to detain or conceal such child so led, taken, or enticed away, shall be imprisoned for not more than 20 years or fined not exceeding $1,000, or both. (March 3, 1901, 31 Stat. 1322, c. 854, sec. 812.)

Thus it will be observed that so far as the abduction, kidnaping, or holding for ransom of any person over 16 years—whatever may be his position or degree—the penalty attaches only when the abducted person is carried from within the District of Columbia out of it or is arrested or imprisoned for the purpose of being taken out of the District. If the person so abducted, kidnaped, or held for ransom is not taken out of the District, and if it can not be shown that his abductors intended to take him out of the District, no offense can be laid under this statute; and only a technical, nominal charge, such as simple assault, may be laid against the offending parties. This is perfectly absurd, though a very dangerous situation is thus presented, as a person over 16 years might be kidnaped and held for ransom in the District and upon detection and conviction only a trivial penalty could be enforced.

If the victim be over 16 and taken out of the District, or seized for the purpose of being taken out of the District, the penalty is wholly inadequate for any aggravated case, the same being imprisonment for not less than one nor more than seven years, or a fine not exceeding $1,000, or both imprisonment and fine.

If a child under 16 is led, carried, or enticed away, with the intent unlawfully to detain or conceal such child, the penalty is imprisonment not more than 20 years, or a fine not exceeding $1,000, or both. This penalty, also, is inadequate in extreme cases, and the language of the provision is not broad enough to meet the various situations which may arise.

The bill (H. R. 10089) was prepared with the assistance and advice of the United States Attorney for the District of Columbia and his staff, and is believed to cover every phase of the subject. Its provisions are broad enough to cover the abduction, kidnaping, and holding for ransom within the District of Columbia, as well as for conveying the victims, of whatever age, beyond the District line. The fine provided in the present law is eliminated as being too trivial in character for any offense so serious as that described. Also, in this measure any conspiracy involved in the commission of any such offense, followed by an overt act, constitutes a violation of the provisions of the measure.

Further in this bill (H. R. 10089) the death penalty is permitted, within the discretion of the jury, upon conviction. The language employed follows that contained in the District of Columbia law against rape. As already indicated, I believe that in the most flagrant cases of kidnaping and holding for ransom, the extreme penalty should be meted out to these archfiends.

DUPLICATE SENATE BILL

On May 18, 1932, there was introduced in the Senate by Senator PATTERSON the duplicate (S. 4694) of H. R. 10089. A hearing was had thereon before the Senate District of Columbia Committee this month, at which I appeared and explained the purposes of this bill; and the committee on June 20, 1932 (Rept. No. 846), favorably reported the bill, without change or amendment.

Included in the Senate committee's report is the letter approving the measure submitted by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. Therein is indicated the like approval of the United States Attorney for the District of Columbia. The report also includes letters of approval from the Federation of Citizens' Associations of the District, the District of Columbia Federation of Women's Clubs, and the Stanton Park Citizens' Association of the District.

From the Senate report the following is quoted:

PRESENT LAW INADEQUATE

The District Commissioners and the United States attorney deem this law inadequate.

Except in the case of children, no penalty attaches to the abduction and holding for ransom of any person within the District of Columbia.

At the committee's public hearing on this bill, the Hon. MAURICE H. THATCHER, Member of the House of Representatives and author of an identical bill, pointed out that the President or Members of the Senate or House could be abducted and held within the District, and the kidnapers could not be prosecuted for any greater offense than, possibly, simple assault.

PROVISIONS OF BILL

The bill hereby reported closes this loophole in the statute. It presents a greatly improved section, and gives the court wide discretion as to the penalty to be imposed in case of conviction.

Broadening the scope of the law to include holding for ransom or reward or for any other unlawful purpose, the bill fixes the penalty as "imprisonment for life or for such term as the court in its discretion may determine; except that in any such case the jury may add to their verdict, if it be guilty, the words 'with the death penalty,' in which case the punishment shall be death by electrocution."

INDORSEMENT

The bill has the approval of the District Commissioners, the United States attorney, the Federation of Citizens' Associations, the District of Columbia Federation of Women's Clubs, and the Stanton Park Citizens' Association. The communications of the commissioners and interested organizations are appended hereto as part of this report.

In my own State of Kentucky the maximum penalty for kidnaping and holding for ransom is death. If I am not mistaken, a like penalty is provided in certain other States.

COMMITTEE ACTION

The Senate bill, S. 4694, is now on the Senate Calendar awaiting action. H. R. 10089 is yet in the House District of Columbia Committee, to which committee it was referred for consideration and action. Formal approval of the measure—as was also true as regards the Senate bill—by the Commissioners of the District, and by the District's United States attorney, has been formally indicated to the House committee.

IMPORTANCE OF LEGISLATION

The proposed legislation is of such vital importance that I most earnestly hope that the House committee will accord its favorable consideration thereto. I very much regret the delay involved in getting action on the House bill. The gross inadequacy of the present District law presents a condition of grave danger; and it may prove very unfortunate if the measure is not promptly enacted into law.

Permit me to say in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that it is to be hoped that not only the Congress of the United States but all the States as well will exercise the fullest powers authorized for the purpose of curbing these most heinous offenses which, in one or another form, have persisted on the earth since the day on which Joseph was seized and sold by his brethren into Egyptian bondage down to the kidnaping and murder of baby Lindbergh. The ease with which, by the use of the automobile over good roads and other means of modern transportation, these and other crimes of violence may be committed, render the situation a grave, indeed, a most critical one. The challenge of the underworld must be met and answered by an enlightened civilization, else the entire social order will be overthrown.

SENATE

SATURDAY, JUNE 18, 1932

(Legislative day of Wednesday, June 15, 1932)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

TAX ON ELECTRICAL ENERGY

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I have received a letter from a gentleman whose opinions I highly value, requesting information as to what was my attitude, during the consideration of the tax bill, toward a tax on electrical energy and I have replied as follows:

During the pendency of the tax bill I was opposed to any tax of any sort, kind, nature or description on electrical energy no matter by whom the tax is to be paid and no matter in what form. When the tax bill was before the Senate on May 31 last, there were three roll calls proposing various taxes on electrical energy, and in each instance I certainly voted against any tax on electrical energy, no matter in what form and no matter by whom the tax was to be paid. Please see CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, date of May 31, and you will perceive that I voted "No" in each instance. One of the reasons why I voted against any tax in any form on electrical energy was I feared that when the tax bill would come out of the conference committee the electrical tax would be passed on to the consumer, and my fears were all too well founded, for that is exactly what happened.

Sincerely yours,

HENRY F. ASHURST.

SUPREME COURT OPINION IN CASE OF GEORGE OTIS SMITH (S. DOC. NO. 111)

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a copy of the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of United States, appellant, against George Otis Smith. It will be remembered that George Otis Smith was appointed a member of the Federal Power Commission in 1931, that the President was notified of his confirmation, and thereafter the Senate attempted to recall the nomination. Subsequently a resolution was adopted by the Senate directing that the question be taken up on quo warranto proceedings in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. That was done and the case was finally appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States. Under date of May 2, 1932, that court rendered an opinion sustaining the President. It has occurred to me that it might be informative to have the opinion made a part of the RECORD and also printed as a Senate document. I ask unanimous consent that that may be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The opinion is as follows:

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

No. 694—October term, 1932

UNITED STATES, APPELLANT, v. GEORGE OTIS SMITH—ON CERTIFICATE FROM THE COURT OF APPEALS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

[May 2, 1932]

Mr. Justice Brandeis delivered the opinion of the court.

This petition, in the name of the United States, for a writ of quo warranto was filed in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, on relation of the district attorney, in deference to the desire of the United States Senate to have presented for judicial decision the question whether George Otis Smith holds lawfully the office of member and chairman of the Federal Power Commission. The case was heard upon the petition and answer. On December 22, 1931, the trial court entered judgment denying the petition. An appeal was promptly taken to the Court of Appeals of the District. That court certified a question pursuant to section 239 of the Judicial Code. This court granted joint motions of the parties to bring up the entire record and to advance the cause.

On December 3, 1930, the President of the United States transmitted to the Senate the nomination of George Otis Smith to be a member of the Federal Power Commission for a term expiring June 22, 1935. On December 20, 1930, the Senate, in open executive session, by a vote of 38 to 22, with 35 Senators not voting, advised and consented to the appointment of Smith to the office for which he had been nominated. On the same day, the Senate ordered that the resolution of confirmation be forwarded to the President.[1] This order was entered late in the evening of Saturday, December 20; and still later on the same day the Senate adjourned to January 5, 1931. On Monday, December 22, 1930, the Secretary of the Senate notified the President of the United States of the resolution of confirmation, the communication being delivered by the official messenger of the Senate.[2] Subsequently, and on the same day, the President signed and, through the Department of State, delivered to Smith a commission purporting to appoint him a member of the Federal Power Commission and designating him as chairman thereof. Smith then, on the same day, took the oath of office and undertook forthwith to discharge the duties of a commissioner.

On January 5, 1931, which was the next day of actual executive session of the Senate after the date of confirmation, a motion to reconsider the nomination of Smith was duly made by a Senator who had voted to confirm it, and also a motion to request the President to return the resolution of confirmation which had passed into his possession. Both motions were adopted and the President was notified in due course. On January 10, 1931, the President informed the Senate by a message in writing that he had theretofore appointed Smith to the office in question, after receiving formal notice of confirmation, and that, for this reason, he refused to accede to the Senate's request.[3]

Thereafter a motion was made and adopted in the Senate directing the executive clerk to place on the Executive Calendar the "name and nomination of the said George Otis Smith." Subsequently, on February 4, 1931, the President pro tempore of the Senate put to the Senate the question of advice and consent to the appointment of Smith, and a majority of the Senators voted in the negative. Notification of this action was sent to the President. On the following day, February 5, 1931, the Senate by resolution requested the district attorney of the District of Columbia to institute in its Supreme Court proceedings in quo warranto to test Smith's right to hold office; and, pursuant to that request, this proceeding was filed on May 4, 1931. As the officials of the Department of Justice were committed by an opinion of the Attorney General (36 Ops. Atty. Gen. 382) to a conclusion adverse to the position taken by the Senate, consent to the institution of the proceeding was conditioned upon the Senate's employing its own counsel and upon the understanding that officials of the Department of Justice would not support the petitioner.

No fact is in dispute. The sole question presented is one of law. Did the Senate have the power, on the next day of executive session, to reconsider its vote advising and consenting to the appointment of George Otis Smith, although meanwhile, pursuant to its order, the resolution of consent had been communicated to the President, and thereupon, the commission had issued, Smith had taken the oath of office and had entered upon the discharge of his duties? The answer to this question depends primarily upon the applicable Senate rules. These rules are numbers XXXVIII and XXXIX.[4] The pivotal provisions are paragraphs 3 and 4 of Rule XXXVIII, which read:

"3. When a nomination is confirmed or rejected any Senator voting in the majority may move for a reconsideration on the same day on which the vote was taken, or on either of the next

[1] The terms of the resolution were: "Resolved, That the Senate advise and consent to the appointment of the above-named person to the office named agreeably to his said nomination." Upon the announcement of the vote, the President pro tempore stated: "The Senate advises and consents to the nomination and the President will be notified." No objection being made, or further proceedings having been had, in the Senate with reference to said consent or the notification thereof, the following order was entered by the Secretary of the Senate in usual course upon the Executive Journal of the Senate for December 20, 1930: Ordered, That the foregoing resolution of confirmation be forwarded to the President of the United States."

Further action being had in executive session on the same day with reference to other nominations, there was entered on the Journal for that day the following order: "Ordered, That all resolutions of confirmation this day agreed to be forwarded forthwith to the President of the United States."

[2] The terms of the communication were: "In executive session, Senate of the United States, Saturday, December 20, 1930. Resolved, That the Senate advise and consent to the appointment of the following-named persons to the offices named agreeably to their respective nominations:

"FEDERAL POWER COMMISSION

"George Otis Smith, to be a member for the term expiring June 22, 1935.

"Frank R. McNinch, to be a member for the term expiring June 22, 1934.

"Marcel Garsaud, to be a member for the term expiring June 22, 1932.

"Attest:

"(Signed) EDWIN P. THAYER,
"Secretary."

[3] The message of the President read as follows:

"To the Senate of the United States:

"I am in receipt of the resolution of the Senate dated January 5, 1931—

"'That the President of the United States be respectfully requested to return to the Senate the resolution advising and consenting to the appointment of George Otis Smith to be a member of the Federal Power Commission, which was agreed to on Saturday, December 20, 1930.'

"I have similar resolutions in respect to the appointment of Messrs. Claude L. Draper and Col. Marcel Garsaud.

"On December 20, 1930, I received the usual attested resolution of the Senate, signed by the Secretary of the Senate, as follows:

"'Resolved, That the Senate advise and consent to the appointment of the following-named person to the office named agreeably to his nomination:

"'FEDERAL POWER COMMISSION

"'George Otis Smith, to be a member of the Federal Power Commission.'

"I have similar resolutions in respect to Colonel Garsaud and Mr. Draper.

"I am advised that these appointments were constitutionally made, with the consent of the Senate formally communicated to me, and that the return of the documents by me and reconsideration by the Senate would be ineffective to disturb the appointees in their offices. I can not admit the power in the Senate to encroach upon the Executive functions by removal of a duly appointed executive officer under the guise of reconsideration of his nomination.

"I regret that I must refuse to accede to the requests.

"HERBERT HOOVER.

"THE WHITE HOUSE, January 10, 1931."

[4] Rule XXXIX provides: "The President of the United States shall, from time to time, be furnished with an authenticated transcript of the executive records of the Senate, but no further extract from the Executive Journal shall be furnished by the Secretary, except by special order of the Senate; and no paper except original treaties transmitted to the Senate by the President of the United States, and finally acted upon by the Senate, shall be delivered from the office of the Secretary without an order of the Senate for that purpose." The transcript of executive records relating to action by the Senate on nominations, furnished to the President under this rule, appears to consist only of copies of resolutions of confirmation or rejection.

two days of actual executive session of the Senate; but if a notification of the confirmation or rejection of a nomination shall have been sent to the President before the expiration of the time within which a motion to reconsider may be made, the motion to reconsider shall be accompanied by a motion to request the President to return such notification to the Senate. Any motion to reconsider the vote on a nomination may be laid on the table without prejudice to the nomination, and shall be a final disposition of such motion.

"4. Nominations confirmed or rejected by the Senate shall not be returned by the Secretary to the President until the expiration of the time limited for making a motion to reconsider the same, or while a motion to reconsider is pending, unless otherwise ordered by the Senate."

The contention on behalf of the Senate is that it did not advise and consent to the appointment of George Otis Smith to the office of member of the Federal Power Commission, because, by action duly and regularly taken upon reconsideration in accordance with its standing rules, it refused such consent, and gave to the President formal notice of its refusal.

The argument is that the action of the Senate in assenting to the nomination of Smith on December 20, 1930, and ordering that the President be notified, was taken subject to its rules and had only the effect provided for by them; that the rules empowered the Senate, in plain and unambiguous terms, to entertain, at any time prior to the expiration of the next two days of actual executive session, a motion to reconsider its vote advising and consenting to the appointment, although it had previously ordered a copy of the resolution of consent to be forwarded forthwith to the President; that the Senate's action can not be held to be final so long as it retained the right to reconsider; that the Senate did not by its order of notification waive its right to reconsider or intend that the President should forthwith commission Smith; that the rules did not make the right of reconsideration dependent upon compliance by the President with its request that the resolution of consent be returned; that the rules were binding upon the President and all other persons dealing with the Senate in this matter; that as the President was charged with knowledge of the rules, his signing of the commission prior to the expiration of the period within which the Senate might entertain a motion to reconsider had no conclusive legal effect; and that the nominee who had not been legally confirmed could not by his own acts in accepting the commission, taking an oath of office, and beginning the discharge of his duties vest himself with any legal rights.

Counsel for the Senate assert that a survey of the historical development of the rules of the Senate relating to reconsideration confirms its present interpretation of the rules; and that the interpretation is further confirmed by the multitudinous instances appearing in the Executive Journal of the Senate in which the President, at the Senate's request, returned resolutions, both of confirmation and of rejection.[5] We are of opinion that the Senate's contention is unsound.

First. The question primarily at issue relates to the construction of the applicable rules, not to their constitutionality. Article I, section 5, clause 2, of the Constitution provides that "each House may determine the rules of its proceedings." In United States v. Ballin (144 U. S. 1, 5) the court said: "Neither do the advantages or disadvantages, the wisdom or folly of * * * a rule present any matters for judicial consideration. With the courts the question is only one of power. The Constitution empowers each House to determine its rules of proceedings. It may not by its rules ignore constitutional restraints or violate fundamental rights, and there should be a reasonable relation between the mode or method of proceeding established by the rule and the result which is sought to be attained. But within these limitations all matters of method are open to the determination of the House, and it is no impeachment of the rule to say that some other way would be better, more accurate, or even more just." Whether, if the rules of the Senate had in terms reserved power to reconsider a vote of advice and consent under the circumstances here presented, such reservation would be effective as against the President's action, need not be considered here.

As the construction to be given to the rules affects persons other than Members of the Senate, the question presented is of necessity a judicial one. Smith asserts that he was duly appointed to office, in the manner prescribed by the Constitution. See Marbury v. Madison (1 Cranch, 137, 155, 156). The Senate disputes the claim. In deciding the issue the court must give great weight to the Senate's present construction of its own rules; but so far, at least, as that construction was arrived at subsequent to the events in controversy, we are not concluded by it.

Second. Obviously, paragraph 3 of Senate Rule XXXVIII contemplates circumstances under which the Senate may still reconsider a vote confirming or rejecting a nomination, although notification of its original action has already been sent to the President. Otherwise the provision for a motion to request the return of a resolution would be meaningless. But paragraph 4 of the same rule contemplates that normally such notification shall be withheld until the expiration of the time limited for making a motion to reconsider, and if a motion be made, until the disposition thereof; for it declares that notification shall be so withheld "unless otherwise ordered by the Senate." In this case the Senate did so order otherwise; and the question is as to the meaning and effect of this special procedure.

Smith urges that upon receipt of a resolution of advice and consent, final upon its face, the President is authorized to complete the appointment; and that a request to return the resolution can have no effect unless it is received prior to the signing of the commission; that if this were not true the notification would not authorize the President to do anything until the expiration of the reconsideration period, and hence would be futile; or it would purport to authorize him to make an appointment defeasible upon reconsideration and reversal of the Senate's action, and hence would violate a constitutional requirement of unconditional assent. We do not understand counsel for the appellant to urge that an appointment so defeasible may be made, and we have, therefore, no occasion to consider the constitutional objections, advanced on Smith's behalf, to a construction permitting such action. Nor need we consider whether the President might decline to accede to a request to return the Senate's resolution if he received it before making the appointment. The question at issue is whether, under the Senate's rules, an order of notification empowers the President to make a final and indefeasible appointment if he acts before notice of reconsideration; or whether, despite the notification, he is powerless to complete the appointment until two days of executive session shall have passed without the entry of a motion to reconsider.

Third. The natural meaning of an order of notification to the President is that the Senate consents that the appointment be forthwith completed and that the appointee take office. This is the meaning which, under the rules, a resolution bears when it is sent in normal course after the expiration of the period for reconsideration. Notification before that time is an exceptional procedure which may be adopted only by unanimous consent of the Senate.[6] We think it a strained and unnatural construction to say that such extraordinary, expedited notification signifies less than final action or bears a different meaning than notification sent in normal course pursuant to the rules.

It is essential to the orderly conduct of public business that formality be observed in the relations between different branches of the Government charged with concurrent duties, and that each branch be able to rely upon definite and formal notice of action by another.[7] The construction urged by the Senate would prevent the President from proceeding in any case upon notification of advice and consent without first determining through unofficial channels whether the resolution had been forwarded in compliance with an order of immediate notification or by the Secretary in the ordinary course of business, for the resolution itself bears only the date of its adoption. If the President determined that the resolution had been sent within the time limited for making a motion to reconsider, he would have then to inform himself when that period expired. If the motion were made, he would be put upon notice of it by receipt of a request to return the resolution. But under the view urged by the Senate, that reconsideration may proceed even though the resolution be not returned, he would receive no formal advice as to the disposition of the motion, save in the case of a final vote of rejection or confirmation.[8] The uncertainty and confusion which would be engendered by such a construction repel its adoption.

The Senate has offered no adequate explanation of the meaning of an order of immediate notification, if it has not the meaning which Smith contends should be attached to it. Its counsel argues that the practice of ordering such notification developed at a time when the Senate passed upon nominations in closed session; and that the order may have been simply a means of furnishing the President with information, not available through public channels,

[5] At the argument in the Supreme Court of the District the parties joined in submitting a pamphlet containing a list of precedents for the reconsideration by the Senate of a vote confirming or rejecting a nomination after notification of the President of its action thereon; and this pamphlet was filed with the opinion of that court. Before entry of the order denying the petition, the parties, by stipulation, submitted additional information in regard to facts concerning nominations, confirmation, and the issuance of commissions in special cases, as shown by the Senate Executive Journal, by records of the executive offices of the White House, and in certain instances by departmental records. The stipulation was made part of the record in the case in the Supreme Court. In accordance with agreement of counsel, both the pamphlet and the stipulation were printed as one document by the clerk of the Court of Appeals.

Unless otherwise indicated, the references in the succeeding footnotes are drawn from this material.

[6] The practice of the Senate seems to be to treat the ordering of immediate notification to the President as, in effect, a suspension of the rules requiring unanimous consent. (See, e. g., 74 CONG. REC., pt. 2, pp. 1748–1749, 1937, 2066; id., pt. 3, p. 3393; CONG. REC., 72d Cong., 1st sess., pp. 3782, 3881.)

[7] Paragraph (2) of Senate Rule XIII, dealing with reconsideration of measures which have been sent to the House of Representatives, contains a provision for a motion to request the return of a measure similar to that of Rule XXXVIII in respect to nominations. No precedent has been called to the court's attention indicating that this provision would be construed as permitting the Senate to proceed to a reconsideration even though the House declined to honor its request.

[8] Thus the motion to reconsider might be withdrawn or tabled, or, when put to a vote, might fail, in any of which events the nomination would stand as confirmed, without further notice to the President. If the motion prevailed, the nomination would stand as originally made by the President, but no notice of that fact would reach him unless it were again finally acted upon.

concerning the probable attitude of the Chamber prior to final action. It is suggested that the President might thereby be enabled to muster support for a nominee at first rejected or to withdraw the nomination before final rejection. But the explanation has no application to a notification of a favorable vote. Nor is it credible that the Senate by unanimous vote would adopt a procedure designed merely to permit the exertion of influence upon a majority to change a decision already made. The construction urged is a labored one. It should not be adopted unless plainly required by the history of the rules and by the meaning which the Senate and the executive department in practice have given them.

Fourth. We find nothing in the history of the rules which lends support to the contention of the Senate, and much in their history to the contrary. The present rules relating to the reconsideration of votes confirming or rejecting nominations are substantially those of March 25, 1868. The earlier history is this: Prior to April 6, 1867, no rule had dealt specifically with reconsideration of votes concerning nominations. A resolution adopted February 25, 1790, provided generally that "when a question has been once made and carried in the affirmative or negative, it shall be in order for any member of the majority to move for a reconsideration of it." In 1806 two limitations were attached to this provision: First, that "no motion for the reconsideration of any vote shall be in order after a bill, resolution, message, report, amendment, or motion upon which the vote was taken shall have gone out of the possession of the Senate, nor after the usual message shall have been sent from the Senate announcing their decision"; and, second, that no such motion shall be in order "unless made on the same day in which the vote was taken or within the three next days of actual session of the Senate thereafter."[9] In 1818 a resolution was adopted "that in future all nominations approved or definitively acted on by the Senate be by the Secretary returned to the President of the United States from day to day, as such proceedings may occur, any rule or usage to the contrary notwithstanding."

These rules remained in force until 1867.[10] Under them the Senate decided by unanimous vote in 1830, in the earliest of the precedents cited by the parties, that it was without power to reconsider its rejection of the nomination of Isaac Hill as second Comptroller of the Treasury "because the President had been notified." No request appears to have been made in that case for the return of the resolution of rejection. Subsequently, however, it became the practice for the President, upon request, to return resolutions of rejection or confirmation as a matter of comity; and the Senate thereupon reconsidered its action, despite the question under its rules whether reconsideration was in order. Between 1830, the time of Hill's case, and April 5, 1867, about 160 such cases occurred. But several occurring at the close of the period show clearly the limits of the practice. In two cases the President declined to return the resolution on the ground that the commission had already issued, and the Senate acceded to the refusal.[11] In another the resolution was returned, but with the statement that a commission had issued; and the Senate appears to have taken no further action.[12] And on April 3, 1867, in the case of A. C. Fisk, the Senate upheld a decision of the Chair that a motion to reconsider a vote of confirmation was out of order after the President had been notified and before the resolution had been returned.

Three days thereafter decisive changes were made in the rules relating both to reconsideration and to notification of the President.[13] On April 6, 1867, the rule concerning reconsideration was modified so as to except specifically motions to reconsider votes upon a nomination from the general prohibition of any such motion where the paper announcing the Senate's decision had gone out of its possession; and the present provision was added that "a motion to reconsider a vote upon a nomination shall always, if the resolution announcing the decision of the Senate has been sent to the President, be accompanied by a motion requesting the President to return the same to the Senate." At the same time, it was provided that "all nominations approved or definitely acted on by the Senate shall be returned by the Secretary on the next day after such action is had, unless otherwise ordered by the Senate."

These changes in the rules not only met the situation which had arisen in Fisk's case but gave explicit sanction to the long-standing practice of requesting the President to return resolutions upon nominations and thereafter reconsidering them. Counsel for the Senate argue that, in addition, they completely reversed the practice theretofore established in respect to reconsideration after notification of the President; that by divorcing the period for reconsideration from the normal time for notifying the President they showed an intention that the power to reconsider should be unaffected by the transmittal of notification or by the President's action thereon. In a case occurring shortly after the new rules were adopted, however, the Senate Committee on the Judiciary clearly showed its understanding that no such change had taken place. Noah L. Jeffries was nominated for Register of the Treasury and confirmed and the President was notified. To a subsequent request for the return of the resolution the President replied that a commission had already issued. The Committee on the Judiciary, to which the matter was referred, expressed the opinion that the Senate had power to reconsider its vote, but gave as its reason that the request to return the resolution had in fact been received before the commission was signed.[14]

[9] This rule was altered in 1820 by limiting the time for making a motion to reconsider to two days and by striking out the words "nor after the usual message shall have been sent from the Senate."

[10] In 1792, on January 27, the Senate, in executive session, ordered "that the President of the United States be furnished with an authenticated transcript of the executive records of the Senate from time to time," and "that no executive business in future be published by the Secretary of the Senate." The latter provision remained in force until June 18, 1929, when it was resolved that all such business should be transacted in open session. The former provision is still in force, although modified by subsequent rules. See note 4, supra. The first such modification was the resolution of March 27, 1818, mentioned in the text, making special provision for immediate notification of the President concerning action upon nominations. On January 5, 1829, it was "Resolved, That no paper sent to the Senate by the President of the United States or any executive officer be returned or delivered from the office of the Secretary without an order of the Senate for that purpose."

On February 18, 1843, the Senate adopted the following resolution: "That nominations made by the President to the Senate, and which are neither approved nor rejected during the session at which they are made, shall not be acted upon at any succeeding session without being again made by the President, and that such shall hereafter be the rule of the Senate. This resolution is in substance incorporated in present Rule XXXVIII, paragraph (6).

[11] These were the nominations of John H. Goddard, in 1864, for justice of the peace for Washington County, D. C., and of Westley Frost, in 1867, as assessor of internal revenue for the twenty-first district of Pennsylvania. In the Goddard case, President Lincoln advised the Senate simply that the resolution was sent to the Department of State prior to receipt of the request for its return, and that "a commission in accordance therewith [was] issued to Mr. Goddard on the same day, the appointment being thus perfected and the resolution becoming a part of the permanent records of the Department of State." No further proceedings are recorded in the Senate Executive Journal. In the Frost case, after a similar reply, Senator Sherman offered a resolution that "the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to recall the commission * * * and that the President be requested to return to the Senate the action of the Senate in the appointment. * * *" This resolution was rejected by a vote of 14 to 23.

[12] In the case of Joseph K. Barnes, nominated as Medical Inspector General in 1864, President Lincoln returned the resolution of confirmation but "respectfully called" the attention of the Senate to certain circumstances, including the execution and delivery of a commission before the making of the motion to reconsider. The author of the motion to reconsider asked and had leave to withdraw it.

In the case of H. H. Smith, nominated as secretary of the Territory of New Mexico in 1867, President Johnson returned the resolution of confirmation, together with a report of the Secretary of State that "the commission was made out and sent to the Executive Mansion for signature and has not been returned." It is not clear that a commission did, in fact, issue. No further proceedings are recorded in the Journal.

[13] These changes were apparently prompted by certain of the incidents just referred to. The resolution presented by Senator Sherman in the Frost case, supra, Note 11, was rejected on April 1, 1867. The amended rules were adopted April 6, 1867, on motion of Senator Fessenden, who had appealed to the Senate from the decision of the chair in the Fisk case.

[14] The President returned the resolution, with an accompanying report of the Secretary of the Treasury. The report stated "that in the ordinary transaction of business the commission was issued on the 14th instant by the State Department, and was received at this department on the 15th instant. General Jeffries had legally qualified and entered upon the discharge of the duties of his office prior to the receipt of the Senate resolution of the 14th instant, which, under these circumstances, is herewith returned." The Committee on the Judiciary reported in part as follows: "It * * * appears that before Mr. Jeffries had been qualified or commissioned as required by law precedent to his entering upon the discharge of his functions under his permanent appointment the President of the United States, in whom the sole right of appointment, subject to the approval of the Senate, is vested by the Constitution, had received notice from the Senate that it had not finally acted upon the question of advising and consenting to the nomination, and withdrawing its resolution of assent to that appointment which had been transmitted to the President on the same day; and the committee are, therefore, of the opinion that the Senate may now lawfully reconsider its vote advising and consenting to the appointment if it shall see proper cause therefor. In this view of the case a majority of the committee were of opinion that it was inexpedient to enter upon an inquiry as to the matter of fact whether the issuing of the commission in this case and the qualification of the officer in question was hastened for any cause out of the usual course of business." The only evidence concerning the subsequent history of the case is that during the same session, some five months later, Mr. Jeffries was nominated for another office, and rejected.

In the case of Samuel M. Pollock, confirmed as brigadier general by brevet, on April 8, 1867, the President, on April 11, complied with a request to return the resolution sent him on April 10, and the Senate later rejected the nomination. The records of the War Department show April 11, 1867, as the date of a commission to Samuel M. Pollock. The entry is marked in red ink, "Canceled

The basis for the argument drawn from the rules of 1867, however, was clearly destroyed a year later, when the rule for notification was further altered, and given virtually its present form. The new rule, adopted March 25, 1868, provided that "nominations approved or definitely acted on by the Senate shall not be returned by the Secretary of the Senate to the President until the expiration of the time limited for making a motion to reconsider, or while a motion to reconsider is pending, unless otherwise ordered by the Senate." No material changes have since been made, either in this rule or in that respecting reconsideration.[15]

Read in the light of the preceding rules and the practice under them, the meaning of the rules thus established is, in our opinion, free from doubt. Prior to 1867 it had been continuously recognized that the President was authorized to commission a nominee upon receiving notification of the advice and consent of the Senate, and that the signing of a commission cut short the power of reconsideration. The Senate so concedes. No explicit change in this respect was made either in the rules of 1867 or of 1868. The inference that no change was intended is strengthened by the fact that under the latter rules, for the first time, the sending of notification ordinarily coincided with the lapse of power in the Senate to reconsider its action under any circumstances. The proviso "unless otherwise ordered by the Senate" made possible the sending of notification before the expiration of the period provided for reconsideration. But there is no indication that the Senate intended thereby to introduce a complete departure from past practice. The natural inference is to the contrary. The proviso for immediate notification must be read in connection with the clause permitting motions to request the return of a resolution, which would be in order only in cases in which the Senate had acted under the proviso. A motion to request the return of a resolution was a familiar device, employed by the Senate on repeated occasions. There is no reason to suppose that such a motion was now intended to have a different effect than that which, by common understanding, it had had in the past. The common understanding had been that a motion to request the return of a resolution was without effect if the President before receiving it had completed the appointment.

Fifth. This construction of the rules is confirmed by the precedents in the Senate arising since 1868. In all cases in which no commission had yet issued, the Executive has honored the request of the Senate for a return of its resolution, in accordance with the invariable practice from the beginning.[16] In the only instances, prior to the case at bar, in which the Senate had occasion to consider the effect, under the present rules, of the signing of the commission before receipt of its request, it indicated an understanding that the power to reconsider was gone.[17] In those two cases the President wrote informing the Senate of the issuance of a commission, and no further action was taken by it.

Attention is called, however, to other cases in which it is contended that the President returned the resolution in spite of the intervening signing of a commission, and that the Senate reconsidered its action. Sixteen cases arising after 1868 are cited.[18] The value of most of these cases as precedents is questioned by Smith and also by the Attorney General and the Solicitor General in the brief filed by them amici curiæ. In none of the cases is there any indication that the Senate was informed of the fact of the signing of the commission, if in fact the commission was signed. Therefore none of those cases furnish an authoritative construction by the Senate of its own rules made prior to the events culminating in the present litigation. They amount, at most, only to evidence of the construction placed upon the rules by the executive department. The weight of many of the cases, as such evidence, is further lessened by the circumstance that the records do not disclose beyond dispute that a commission had actually been signed by the President before receipt of the Senate's request for return of its resolution.[19] All the cases but one arose between 1870 and 1889, nine of them in the administrations of President Grant and President Hayes. Each of these Presidents on occasion refused to accede to similar requests on the ground that a commission had already been issued.[20]

(rejected by the Senate)." Counsel for Smith and the Attorney General and Solicitor General in their brief amici curiæ question whether a commission was in fact issued in this case. See Note 19, infra.

[15] The phrase "approved or definitely acted on" was changed in 1877 to "confirmed or rejected," and as so changed the rule still stands as paragraph 4 of Rule XXXVIII. The rule on reconsideration was also given its present wording in 1877, when the material affecting nominations was taken out of the general provision relating to reconsideration in Rule XX and placed in a separate rule. The only changes of substance were the extension of the period for reconsideration to two days of "actual executive session," and the addition of the sentence: "Any motion to reconsider the vote on a nomination may be laid on the table without prejudice to the nomination, and shall be a final disposition of such motion." At the same time there was added as a separate rule the following, now paragraph 5 of Rule XXXVIII: "When the Senate shall adjourn or take a recess for more than 30 days, all motions to reconsider a vote upon a nomination which has been confirmed or rejected by the Senate which shall be pending at the time of taking such adjournment or recess shall fall; and the Secretary shall return all such nominations to the President as confirmed or rejected by the Senate, as the case may be."

[16] The list of precedents incorporated in the record includes some 170 cases of nominations, arising since March 25, 1868, in which motions to reconsider and request the return of the resolution were entered. In almost all the cases the Senate Executive Journal records affirmatively that the President complied with the request. In a few instances the fact of such return is not recorded, although the Senate proceeded with the reconsideration. In no case, except the two referred to in the text, does it affirmatively appear that the President declined to return the resolution. In no case since the earliest precedent listed, in 1830, is there a record of refusal to honor the request on any other ground than that a commission had been signed and the appointment perfected.

[17] In the case of J. C. S. Colby, nominated as consul at Chin Kiang, the Senate on December 17, 1874, voted to confirm and ordered that the President be notified forthwith. On December 21 a motion to reconsider was entered and the return of the resolution was requested. President Grant replied, "Mr. Colby's commission was signed on the 17th day of December, and upon inquiry at the Department of State it was found that it had been forwarded to him by mail before the receipt of the resolution of recall." There is no evidence of further action on the part of the Senate.

Morris Marks was confirmed as collector of internal revenue for the district of Louisiana on June 6, 1878. On June 11 a motion to reconsider was entered and the return of the resolution requested. President Hayes wrote: "In reply I would respectfully inform the Senate that upon the receipt of the notice of confirmation the commission of Mr. Marks was signed and delivered to him on the 8th instant." The Senate Executive Journal records the fact that this message was read, but contains no reference to any subsequent proceedings in the case.

[18] The cases of Lewis A. Scott, originally confirmed on June 7, 1870, as postmaster at Lowville, N. Y.; John W. Bean, confirmed as first lieutenant on Jan. 11, 1872; James F. Legate, confirmed as Governor of Washington Territory on Jan. 26, 1872; George Nourse, confirmed as register of the Linkville land office, Oregon, June 5, 1872; Alva A. Knight, confirmed as United States attorney for the northern district of New York Jan. 21, 1873; Belle C. Shumard, confirmed as deputy postmaster at Fort Smith, Ark., Feb. 6, 1873; Peter C. Shannon, confirmed as chief justice of the Supreme Court of Dakota Territory Mar. 17, 1873; E. Raymond Bliss, confirmed as deputy postmaster at Columbus, Miss., Mar. 18, 1873; John W. Clark, confirmed as deputy postmaster at Montpelier, Vt., Mar. 20, 1873; William H. Tubbs, confirmed as postmaster at New London, Conn., Dec. 20, 1878; Joseph H. Durkee, confirmed as marshal of the northern district of Florida June 30, 1879; Laban J. Miles, confirmed as Indian agent at Osage Agency, Indian Territory, Feb. 15, 1883; George W. Pritchard, confirmed as United States attorney for the Territory of New Mexico Feb. 19, 1883; Thomas H. Reeves, confirmed as Indian agent, Quapau Agency, Indian Territory, Apr. 9, 1884; Edwin I. Kursheedt, confirmed as marshal for the eastern district of Louisiana, Mar. 27, 1889; and William Plimley, confirmed as Assistant Treasurer Mar. 10, 1903.

In the Bean, Legate, Nourse, and Kursheedt cases the Senate Executive Journal does not record whether or not the President returned the resolution, as requested. The President withdrew the nomination of Mr. Legate, on his own request, before the Senate had proceeded further than to debate the motion to reconsider. The Reeves and Plimley nominations were also withdrawn. In the Scott, Knight, and Miles cases the motion to reconsider was withdrawn after return of the resolution; in the Durkee case it was tabled; and in the Bliss and Pritchard cases, when put to a vote, it failed. In the Clark case no further proceeding is recorded after the return of the resolution. In the Shannon and Tubbs cases the nominee was again confirmed; in the Shumard, Bean, Nourse, and Kursheedt cases the Senate adopted the motion to reconsider and either recommitted the nomination or placed it upon the calendar. Only in the last six cases did the Senate in fact exercise the power to reconsider.

It is conceded by Smith that in the cases of Legate, Shumard, and Plimley a commission had in fact been signed by the President at the time he received and acceded to the request for return of the resolution. In the remaining cases the evidence of signing of the commission rests mainly upon entries of dates in the records of the executive offices of the White House. In the Knight and Miles cases there are also copies of the commission in the records of the respective departments. The entry of the date of commission in the Tubbs case appears to have been erased, although it is still legible. Those in the Reeves and Kursheedt cases are scratched or crossed out. See note 19, infra.

[19] The contention of Smith, in which the Attorney General and Solicitor General concur, is that the dates relied on in the White House records are the dates which the commissions bore, but not necessarily those on which they were signed. The practice in the executive offices in this respect appears not to have been uniform. Thus in certain instances pointed out in the brief amici curiæ, taken from a later period, it appears affirmatively, under the heading "Remarks," that the commission was actually signed at a date subsequent to that entered under the heading "Commissioned." On the other hand, in the Plimley case, supra, note 18, and in the Colby and Marks cases, supra, note 17, other evidence indicates that the signature was in fact made on the date entered in the White House records. It appears to be the practice for the appropriate department to prepare the commission in all respects, including the date, upon receipt of notification of confirmation, and thereafter to present it to the Executive to be signed. This practice creates the possibility of disparity between the date of signing and the date of appearing on the commission.

[20] In the Colby and Marks cases, respectively, supra, note 17. The most recent case, which is urged as strongly supporting the Senate's contention, is that of William Plimley. President Roose-

Perhaps the most satisfactory explanation of the instances cited on behalf of the Senate is that the executive department has not always treated an appointment as complete upon the mere signing of a commission.[21] Compare Marbury v. Madison (1 Cranch. 137); United States v. Le Baron (19 How. 73, 78). Even in the view most favorable to the Senate's contention they fall far short of clear recognition of the power, never heretofore asserted by the Senate itself, to reconsider a vote of confirmation, after an appointee has actually assumed office and entered upon the discharge of his duties. We are unable to regard any of the cases as of sufficient weight to overcome the natural meaning of the clauses.[22]

Sixth. To place upon the standing rules of the Senate a construction different from that adopted by the Senate itself when the present case was under debate is a serious and delicate exercise of judicial power. The Constitution commits to the Senate the power to make its own rules; and it is not the function of the court to say that another rule would be better. A rule designed to ensure due deliberation in the performance of the vital function of advising and consenting to nominations for public office, moreover, should receive from the court the most sympathetic consideration. But the reasons, above stated, against the Senate's construction seem to us compelling. We are confirmed in the view we have taken by the fact that, since the attempted reconsideration of Smith's confirmation, the Senate itself seems uniformly to have treated the ordering of immediate notification to the President as tantamount to authorizing him to proceed to perfect the appointment.[23]

The judgment of the Supreme Court of the District is confirmed.

NATIONAL PROHIBITION

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the two newspaper editorials which I hold in my hand, one by Walter Lippmann and the other by Frank Kent, dealing with the subject of prohibition, be printed in full in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

There being no objection, the editorials were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TO-DAY AND TO-MORROW

By Walter Lippmann

THE PROHIBITION PLANK

CHICAGO, June 16.—Under cover of a smoke screen of dry slogans the Republican Party has abandoned national prohibition. So effective was the smoke screen that it may take some time before the drys realize how complete was their defeat and the wets how imposing was their victory. In the convention hall itself the galleries, which were full of wets, booed and howled while the wet cause was winning and the drys on the floor applauded fervently the decision which marked the end of the Republican Party's adherence to national prohibition.

What is it that the Republicans have declared? They have declared that Republicans in the House and the Senate should vote for a resolution submitting a twentieth amendment to the States. They have pledged themselves to specify that the ratification of this new amendment shall be considered not by State legislatures but by specially elected State conventions "adequately safeguarded so as to be truly representative." This can mean only one thing, that they pledge themselves to see that these State conventions are more truly representative than are most of the State legislatures. In other words, they declare that the overrepresentation of rural districts and the underrepresentation of cities, which is characteristic of most legislatures, shall not prevail in the State conventions. This pledge is from the point of view of the practical difficulties of amending prohibition an incalculably important victory for the wets.

The twentieth amendment which the Republicans propose to submit to these State conventions would supersede and, therefore, would in fact repeal the eighteenth amendment. The essence of the eighteenth amendment is that it prohibits and does not merely give Congress the power to prohibit the manufacture and sale of liquor. The new twentieth amendment would take prohibition completely out of the Constitution. Whatever the phrase makers may choose to call it, this is repeal, and it constitutes an absolute victory on the fundamental principle for which the opponents of the eighteenth amendment have always contended.

The twentieth amendment would not only repeal constitutional prohibition but it would deny to Congress the power to impose legislative prohibition. For the Republicans have committed themselves to the principle that the States may legalize liquor, not merely beer and wine, but all liquor, if they wish to do so.

The twentieth amendment would, however, grant certain powers over the liquor traffic to the Federal Government. These powers would be of two kinds. There would be a grant of power to Congress to make laws and to set up enforcement machinery to protect dry States against the invasion of liquor from the wet States. There is no dispute as to the desirability of giving Congress this power. The only difference of opinion is whether it is necessary to amend the legislation in order to provide the power. Some think that the old Constitution vests in Congress all the authority needed; some deny that it does. There can be no possible objection to reaffirming the power if it exists or of granting it if it does not; it is generally agreed that Congress should have the power to protect dry States against invasion. Senator Morrow, who made a profound study of this problem, advocated an amendment which "would vest in the Federal Government power to give all possible protection and assistance to those States that desire complete prohibition against invasion from the States that do not."

But the Republican platform goes farther and proposes to vest more power in Congress. Here the language of the platform is vague, but what the authors probably had in mind was to give Congress the power to declare principles to which the States must conform in legalizing liquor. Their intention, it appears, is to give Congress the power to say that no State may, for example, legalize a system under which liquor is sold for consumption in public places, or conceivably that no State may legalize a liquor traffic conducted for private profit.

Here is matter for considerable debate, and I for one can see no point in making a snap judgment. I should like to see a draft of the amendment which the President would accept as conforming to the language of his platform.

The main point is that this new amendment can go no farther than to grant Congress the power to regulate. It can not prohibit. It can not give Congress the power to prohibit. It can not embed any particular kind of regulation in the Constitution. Since the new amendment can only be a grant of power, it must substitute for the iron inflexibility of the present system a flexible system responsive to public opinion such as prevails in all other civilized countries. The worst that Congress could do under the new amendment could be corrected at any time by a majority vote of Congress.

The wets would be unreasonable if they refused to consider this proposal and to examine carefully the arguments for it which Secretary Mills set forth so cogently in the debate.

I left the convention hall early Thursday morning feeling that the antiprohibitionists had won so great a victory so suddenly that they have not yet adjusted their minds to their new position. The wet galleries were certainly as fanatical and as ignorant and as intolerant as the drys ever were in the days when they were in the saddle. There is danger here, and the wet leaders should stop and consider.

They should remember that it is one thing to fight resolutely to win and another to refuse to make peace with your opponent. It is true that the wets have only won one battle in a campaign which must be fought out in Congress and in the States. But they are in the ascendant and they will make a great mistake if they take a stand which offers the drys no choice but to resist to the bitter end or to surrender abjectly. My view is that on the moot point of this platform—whether or not to grant Congress power to determine the principles upon which the States may legalize liquor—there is no sacrifice of principle in a conciliatory attitude. There is nothing in the proposal to grant Congress a limited power to regulate the liquor traffic which any self-respecting opponent of the eighteenth amendment and of the policy of prohibition need hesitate to consider with an open mind.

velt nominated Plimley in 1903 for Assistant Treasurer of the United States. His commission was made out and signed, and a letter notifying him of his appointment and inclosing an official bond was placed in the mails. Notice of a motion to reconsider the vote of confirmation having been received at the White House, the chief of the division of appointments ordered the letter extracted from the mails, and the President returned the resolution and subsequently withdrew the nomination.

[21] Thus, it will be noted in both the Colby and Marks cases, supra, note 17, that the commission had been either placed in the mails or delivered, and that the message of the President placed emphasis on these facts.

[22] In addition to the Senate precedents above discussed, counsel for the Senate cite various decisions from State courts relating to reconsideration by State and municipal deliberative bodies. People ex rel. MacMahon v. Davis (284 Ill. 439); Witherspoon v. State ex rel. West (138 Miss. 310); Wood v. Cutter (138 Mass. 149); Crawford v. Gilchrist (64 Fla. 41); Dust v. Oatman (126 Mich. 717). None of these cases, however, presented the question here at issue of the effect upon the power to reconsider of an intervening notification of confirmation sent to an appointing officer, and of the signing by that officer of a commission. It is therefore unnecessary to examine the reasoning upon which they were decided.

[23] Thus in the confirmation of Judge Louie W. Strum, Senator FLETCHER in seeking unanimous consent "to waive the rule about two subsequent executive sessions," and notify the President of the Senate's action, gave as his reason that "this judge is very much needed, and has been for some months." (74 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pt. 7, pp. 6489–6490). Notification was ordered on Dec. 21, 1931, of votes confirming nominations to the Interstate Commerce Commission and the board of mediation upon the statement of Senator COUZENS that otherwise "those gentlemen * * * can not hold office until after two executive sessions shall have been held." (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 72d Cong., 1st sess., Dec. 21, 1931, p. 1003.) Again, on Dec. 22, 1931, on the confirmation of Robert B. Adams as engineer in chief of the Coast Guard, Senator COPELAND stated that "this man's appointment expired on the 18th of December, and it is very important that he be immediately put on duty." Notification was ordered. (Id., p. 1131.) On Feb. 1, 1932, notification was ordered of the confirmation of certain appointees to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Board, upon the statement of Senator ROBINSON that "it is believed that there is necessity for the board to function immediately." (Id., p. 3071. See also id., pp. 3415, 3582, 3881.)

THE GREAT GAME OF POLITICS

By Frank R. Kent

A POLITICAL MILESTONE

CONVENTION BUREAU OF THE SUN, CHICAGO, June 16.—If the shrill cries of the professional drys, on the one side, and the extreme wets, on the other, are discounted—and they always should be—this prohibition plank in the Republican platform is the most striking political milestone of a decade. It marks the definite end of the noble experiment, the turn of the country against it.

No one who understands the sentiment and conditions that forced the Republican Party to take this step away from the amendment it has so consistently defended and who appreciates that the Democratic convention, which meets June 27, can not do less and may do more, will doubt that. National prohibition has been sunk. There is no other way to look at it. Its failure, proclaimed for years by its opponents, has been conceded by its friends. So far as this convention is concerned, that is the big news, bigger by far than the nominee for the Presidency or the Vice Presidency. It overshadows everything else, and will be the one thing in the platform remembered.

It was a most amazing rush. The tide that swept the Republicans from their dry moorings started really to run two years ago in the congressional and city elections, but it was the developments of the last 10 days that brought the concrete result. An extraordinary series of events occurred, some of them after the delegates began to gather here—the Rockefeller statement, followed by those of Doctor Mott and Doctor Poling; the defeat of the dry RUTH BRYAN OWEN by a wet in Florida and of Senator MORRISON in North Carolina; the sudden and almost simultaneous declaration for repeal by the Indiana Republicans and the Virginia Democratic convention.

The accumulated speed and volume compelled the administration management, which had come out here with a much milder proposal, to yield. It drove into unnoticed obscurity the militant dry professionals who since 1920 have browbeaten and cowed every convention of both parties, openly directed the leaders of both as to what they should and should not do. What happened here left them numb and without plans.

Six months ago it was a 5 to 1 bet the Republican convention would adopt the old law-enforcement plank upon which both parties have got by for the last 12 years, at least even money the Democrats would do the same. And now look where they have gone. As late as Wednesday morning word went from here to the White House from at least two close and confidential Hoover advisers that unless the plank adopted were accepted the convention would run away on an unqualified repeal proposal—and so it would.

To-day the absorbing topic is the political effect of the plank. Three major points are made for it: First, that it is acceptable to all but the fanatical drys; second, that it opens the door for the wet Republicans to stay inside the party; third, that it is the only possible practical plan with which action in the near and not the dim future can be had. So far as the latter is concerned, the argument is that an unqualified repeal amendment, even if put through Congress, could not be done at the short session in December, and that its ratification could and would be prevented by 13 dry States. It would be delayed for years.

In the case of this proposal, its acceptability to the dry States and its support by heretofore political drys who have been longing for the chance to go wet but not daring to take it, should make it easy enough to get through the short session and its ratification could be had through the State conventions within a year. That is the argument. The truth is that once you sweep aside the tender terms in which prohibition is spoken of in the Republican plank, and the "hooey" about preserving the power of the Federal Government to protect the dry States and its retention of national control, the proposition is astoundingly wet.

What it really will do if it goes through is: Repeal the eighteenth amendment, wipe the Volstead Act off the books, and return the whole liquor problem back to the States to deal with as they will, barring only the restoration of the old-time saloon—even that could be done under another name and with slight camouflage—and done it will be, too.

There will be endless discussion of this plank. It will be assailed from both sides. But these are the facts about it. It is a wet plank, so wet that nothing but a complete knowledge that they were being overwhelmed by the wet avalanche can account for the dry acceptance. Under it the whole scheme of national prohibition is scuttled and the State rights in this business restored. Under it not only light wines and beers will come back to the States that want them but whisky and gin as well.

The real weasel words in the plank are those dealing with the Federal power to impose limitations. This is silly as well as insincere, because the Federal power exists without any action being necsary to retain it and would exist under the straight-out repeal proposal also. Congress can exercise its power under either. That part is put in to save the party's face in having completely abandoned prohibition as a national matter. It does not mean much. Everybody knows that once such an amendment is proposed by two-thirds of Congress and ratified by three-fourths of the States it is not going to be possible to get a majority of Congress to turn in the opposite direction and impose a lot of unpopular limitations.

When you contrast this plank with the record of the two parties on this issue, when you consider the extraordinary dominance which the Anti-Saloon League has exercised of Congress and in politics generally, and when you consider the new vista opening up—when you reflect upon these things the change marked by the adoption of this plank last night comes pretty close to being historic. It is possible the Democrats will go beyond the Republican plan in veering over to the wet side. They will, of course, want to, as it will be advantageous to hold the edge in the wet States, the dry South being less dry now than seemed possible before and safe for Democracy, anyhow. They will at least go as far. It seems to make the end of an era in this century-old battle over liquor.

And it is the new voters who have done it—the twenty-odd million and more who have come of age and got on the registration books since prohibition began.

"DEPRESSION"—ADDRESS BY BERNARD J. ROTHWELL

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a speech delivered over the radio by a very public-spirited citizen of Boston, Mr. Bernard J. Rothwell, his subject being "Depression—The Way In—The Way Out.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPRESSION—THE WAY IN—THE WAY OUT

The existing world-wide agricultural and industrial depression and economic disturbance is felt more acutely in the United States than in other countries, because of the higher standard of living, the greater comfort and even luxury its average citizen has enjoyed hitherto.

In the public mind it dates back some three years; but, two years earlier, there were indications that prosperity was not universal, that many businesses were unprofitable, and that unemployment—already large—was steadily increasing.

He is a wise man who can foretell when the tide will turn; unfortunately, just now the world appears to be sadly lacking in constructive wisdom.

Meanwhile, our system of government, the admiration and the inspiration of the peoples of the world, is being subjected to the most severe test in its peacetime history; it is evident that if the noblest political institution ever devised by men is to survive, ways and means must speedily be adopted to prevent recurring periods of deceptive prosperity and extreme depression. There is no time to lose!

A few years ago, the tiller of the soil envied the then current greater reward and shorter hours of the industrial wage earner. But a transformation has since been wrought; to-day millions of able-bodied willing workers tramp the streets of industrial centers vainly seeking something to do. However unsatisfactory the condition of the average farmer may be, he is immeasurably more fortunate; for, at least, he is reasonably sure of food and shelter and is not dependent for them upon public or private charity.

What caused the present deplorable situation? It is due in large measure to the disastrous World War, with its astounding loss of life and treasure; but if we set aside the resulting foreign complications, political and economic, our own situation may definitely be charged to—

First. Constantly increasing application of science and invention in industry, which not only has caused enormous overproduction and consequent ruinous competitive prices of all products of soil and mine but, still more seriously, has resulted in displacing millions of able and willing wage earners far more rapidly than they could be absorbed by new industries. The purchasing power of the masses thus has been enormously lessened, and industrial activity reduced to a low percentage of normal operation.

Second. Big business, frequently beyond human capacity to properly administer; high finance and inordinate greed for wealth and power.

Third. The overdevelopment of huge manufacturing and distributing corporations, encouraged by banking interests, which furnished funds lavishly to promote this overexpansion, the overbuilding of industrial plants, commercial buildings, etc., often without adequate inquiry as to the soundness of the proposition or the fitness of the parties undertaking it.

Fourth. Participation of leading banks and bankers in underwritings, consolidations, mergers, holding companies, etc., with their unwise and unwarranted increase of outstanding shares, 3, 5, 10, or more being exchanged for 1; the forced appreciation in market price of these depreciated shares, based upon absurdly assumed future prospects, and the effort to earn and pay increasing dividends thereon.

Fifth. Distribution to smaller banks throughout the country of the so-called securities, domestic and foreign, thus underwritten, overloading them with frozen assets, most of which could only be marketed at severe losses; some not at all. This was a principal cause of the multitude of bank failures and the heavy withdrawal of deposits, even from absolutely solvent banks, for the unwise purpose of hoarding, and with the far greater risk of total loss by theft, fire, or unreliable investment.

Sixth. Unequal distribution by corporations of the abnormal profits of the several years prior to the crash of 1929 and failure to allot a liberal share of them to unemployment and age-retirement reserves, which would have lessened greatly the subsequent distress.

Seventh. High-pressure salesmanship that proclaimed "desires" to be "necessities," thrift and provision for the inevitable "rainy day," unwise and unwarranted; men high in authority applying the exploded theory of perpetual motion to the then prevailing hectic prosperity. Hosts of wage earners were thus lured into incurring debts, the payment of which depended entirely upon maintenance of the then current, uncertain family income.

Eighth. The "straw that finally broke the camel's back"; well-nigh universal, insane, speculation in every element of society—bell boy and bishop; preacher and porter; men and women; young and old. The "get-rich-quick" craze which carried widespread ruin into every city, town, and village from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

The failure of stock exchange authorities to curb operations by speculative pools, whose transactions afforded clear evidence of stupendous gambling; they also failed to check the abuse of "short selling."

There were other causes, mention of which time will not permit.

Is there a way out? There is. But the road to recovery will not be short or easy to climb.

The absolutely fundamental need is universal confidence, without which permanent recovery is impossible. This confidence must include confidence on the part of other nations as to the sincerity of our motives in international affairs. Rapidity of communication has knitted the entire world so closely as to compel international economic interdependence. We can not, if we would, ignore this fact.

The prolonged delay of the Senate in approving the entrance of the United States into the World Court has promoted foreign distrust of our good faith in sponsoring the Kellogg-Briand pact; in the sincerity of our professed peaceful purpose, and of our repeated advocacy of disarmament.

Serious international disputes must be settled either by peaceful adjudication or devastating war. Can there be any doubt as to the choice of the American people? Prompt ratification would prove the greatest possible contribution to international confidence and good will. We should call upon our Senators for immediate favorable action.

This would tend to hasten disarmament and greatly lighten the present staggering burden of Federal taxation, largely due to the enormous cost of our Military and Naval Establishments. This, together with the cost of hospitalization, pensions, bonuses, etc., the result of previous wars, forms by far the largest portion of the National Budget.

In addition, a small minority of those who enlisted or were drafted into service now clamor for immediate payment of two and a half billion dollars, which will not accumulate or become due, as per contract, until 1945. Yet this noisy minority scares into its advocacy many of our weak-kneed Representatives in Washington.

The cost of governing the United States has increased enormously within the past five years, many times more rapidly than either population or the national wealth. Meanwhile, taxable incomes have decreased, individual means, large and small, in countless cases, have been wiped out, savings exhausted, and people, formerly of large wealth, made destitute.

Local taxation in farming communities, as well as in cities and towns, has likewise increased by leaps and bounds; governing bodies spending the taxpayers' money recklessly, regardless of the debts they were piling up, until in many cases they had no further borrowing power.

Will the American farmer speak out and say what he thinks about all this?

These and other abuses must be eliminated; measures deemed radical a few years ago will doubtless be enacted and accepted as a matter of course. Among these will be:

Restriction of enormously swollen fortunes through increased income, surtax and inheritance taxes.

Wider distribution of profits to increase purchasing power of the masses.

Establishment of adequate age-retirement and unemployment reserves in industries, large and small.

Restriction of banks and trust companies to the loaning, investing, and safeguarding of deposits; special reserves to provide Government insurance of deposits; speculative promotions and underwritings to be barred.

More strict regulation of stock and commodity exchanges for the protection of the average investor.

Elimination of unfair, dishonorable, unnecessary, and wasteful competition, with Government regulation to protect the consumer; and other important reforms.

Existing troubles in the United States are not the fault of our system of government, but of our failure to insist that it be conducted on the highest plane of integrity, efficiency, and with sole regard to the welfare of the entire Nation.

Stockholders in the largest corporation in the world, its successful management vital to the welfare of every man, woman, and child, many of us are either too indifferent, or too lazy, to attend its annual meetings—the primary or regular elections.

We permit some office seeker, long of tongue and short of brain, to arouse our prejudices and capture our votes, while we pay slight attention to his fitness for the office he seeks; the soundness of his views on questions of the highest importance; his personal integrity or political sincerity.

What can you on the farm and we in the city do to remedy this?

We should take a far more keen interest in public affairs; we should cast off prejudice, religious or racial, and should elect candidates for public office on the sole basis of demonstrated integrity and ability—men with backbone.

We shall thus maintain the supremacy of the Republic and defeat whoever would undermine its foundation of liberty under the law.

In the present emergency all thought of partisanship or of party advantage should be cast aside. It makes no difference to you or to me whether a policy that is sound originates in one party or the other.

In former times there was a distinct cleavage between the two principal parties; to-day this does not exist. On many major issues each party is widely divided within itself. Self-interest is the dominating influence in a high percentage of our representatives, national, State, and municipal.

The ship of state is sailing stormy seas; dangerous reefs lie ahead, but skillful pilotage and a willing, patriotic crew can steer it into safe harbor. Nation-wide public opinion, freely and clearly expressed, should demand a prompt and hearty pull-all-together.

HON. HENRY P. FLETCHER'S GETTYSBURG ADDRESS

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I ask leave to have published in the RECORD the address delivered at Gettysburg on May 30, 1932, by Hon. Henry P. Fletcher, former ambassador to Italy, and also former chairman of the United States Tariff Commission.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, and it is as follows:

Fellow citizens, Gettysburg has double claim to fame. Here was fought the great battle which turned the tide in the struggle to save the Union. Here on this sacred spot a few months later was spoken the greatest speech ever made in the English language, or indeed in any other language, since the Sermon on the Mount.

The two events—the great battle and the great Lincoln address—seem intertwined in the minds of men.

Here, really, the death knell of secession was sounded from the cannon's mouth. Here from the heart of Lincoln came the cry, not of triumph, but of sublime faith in the Union and in the people of this land, and of all lands, to govern themselves.

I have been told by a friend of the older generation, who heard Mr. Lincoln speak that day, that when he came to the concluding passage wherein he proclaimed his democratic faith it was not the prepositions of, by, and for which he accented. He said, "that government of the people, by the people, and for the people shall not perish from the earth."

And so I say in the American epic, Gettysburg symbolizes the two fundamental concepts of our national life—union and democracy; in Mr. Lincoln's mind, union for democracy.

On this day, set apart by the Nation as a day of remembrance, year after year the people of southern Pennsylvania and near-by States gather here to pay their tribute of gratitude to those men of our fathers' generation who fought and wrought to save the Union and our American dream.

To-day, throughout the length and breadth of the land, we commemorate the heroes of all our wars from Independence to Argonne. Like the Greeks of old, we bear floral offerings of sacrifice to their tombs. As these flowers are plucked in the bloom of springtime, so many of our heroes were cut down in their youth. For mostly the young are sacrificed in war. They suffered and died that the United States of America might mean something in and to the world. From first to last our wars were fought to establish and extend, to preserve and defend the democratic ideal of government. We keep their memory green in our hearts. We come, as Lincoln bade us come, as to a shrine, to dedicate ourselves with increased devotion to the cause for which they gave their last full measure of devotion.

Now, as during the Civil War, the Nation is passing through a great crisis. Now, as then, we are being tested. Not now, as then, is there suffering and dying of the wounds and deprivations of organized war, but rather we have mental suffering and physical deprivations of disorganized peace. We are suffering the effects of bad management in business and finance and from governmental incompetency and extravagance.

Our independence was gained, our Government created, our continental empire founded, and our Union preserved only by hard labor, by sacrifice, and by steadfast devotion to our ideals, and so, if our Government is to function efficiently it will be brought about, not by specious and plausible nostrums, but by work and, if necessary, sacrifice, and by that I mean sacrifice by the rich, well-to-do, and poor alike. I am not one of those who believe that the average American is looking for a free ride. I do not believe that we are a nation of hitch-hikers. I believe every self-respecting American is as ready now to do his bit in the way of bearing the burdens of democracy, and that means payment of necessary taxes, as he has been throughout our history to fight for democratic ideals. But he will, or at least should, insist that the taxes he pays be expended for the general welfare and not lavished on particular classes or groups. Many of us, I fear, have neglected our primary duties as citizens and have allowed the affairs of local, State, and National Government to be extravagantly conducted, and we are now suffering the consequences of our own neglect. As long as we could make money, we did not much mind who made the laws and filled the offices. Taxes have mounted silently but steadily. They have come upon us like a thief in the night. In the seven fat years we did not mind them. We could pay them and still live, but now the lean years have come upon us and we find them unbearable. It has been estimated that the national income of all our people in the most prosperous years amounted to about $70,000,000,000, and one-fifth of this income was taken by the tax collector. Now it is estimated that the national income has fallen by over 40 per cent, and taxes are mounting. At least 20 cents of every dollar earned on capital and labor now goes to defray the expense of local, State, and National Government. Every man, woman, and child has to pay over $100 a year to live in this free country, or else some one else has to pay it for them and try to get it back by increasing the cost of living for all of us.

To put it another way, this staggering tax bill of about fourteen billions a year exceeded by two billions the gross value of all farm production in the United States in 1929. Before our farmers, our manufacturers, our merchants, and our day laborers and clerks can earn $1 for themselves, they must contribute directly or indirectly $33,000,000 a day for the support of local and State governments and thirteen millions daily in addition to the Federal Government. This is fantastic. We think that because many of us pay little or no tax directly that our town, township, county, State, and National Government are free. On the contrary, they are the most expensive governments that have ever existed in the world. It now takes the equivalent of one day's work a week from all of us in one form or another and we pay it perhaps without knowing it, but we pay it just the same.

Waste and inefficiency abound in every department of the Government, executive and legislative, and every member of the Government and of Congress knows it, yet little or nothing is done about it. The department heads, Cabinet officers, strenuously object to any important curtailment of the activities and services of their departments and make dire predictions of what will happen if their appropriation is reduced. Superfluous Army posts and naval stations and navy yards can not be abandoned because Senators and Congressmen of the localities affected, under the lash of local business sentiment, band together and defeat these necessary economies. The direct primary has made each Senator and Representative more or less a law unto himself and has practically done away with party cohesion and party discipline. Local interests and local pressure are more important to them politically than party policy and general welfare. This is easily understood. They are subject to constant pressure by political interests and from associations and federations maintaining active professional lobbies in Washington. Their political life depends upon how they stand with their constituents, more particularly with the organized and vociferous sections of them. If a Congressman, ignoring pressure of this kind, votes for what he considers the general good, he gets, unfortunately, little local voting credit for it, on the one hand, and on the other he suffers the active hostility of those in his district whose particular demands he has ignored in the public interest. Therefore we, the generality, who are not vigilant and not belligerent, can be safely ignored.

It might be criticized that I should use this occasion to speak of these things. I make no apology. Democracy is on trial. All these governmental agencies are ours. The bureaucracy that so many inveigh against as so firmly intrenched as to be beyond our reach, is not a Frankenstein. It can be controlled, but it will take congressional courage of rare quality to do it. And by bureaucracy, I mean not only the Government employees in the departments at Washington and in the customs, postal, and other Government services throughout the country, but also the vast machinery for spending money at home and abroad which has been set up under the guise of helping agriculture, shipping, commerce, etc. Some benefit, of course, accrues, but I maintain it is out of all proportion to the money expended.

Part-time employment and salary reductions are important and can be brought about, but they are really only palliatives. They do not go to the root of the matter. In the exceptional circumstances now existing, with millions of our people out of work and in all probability an even worse situation confronting us in the coming year, it is perhaps the best we can hope for now; but Government expenses have got to be cut down, and useless and overlapping services abolished. Numerous efforts have been made from time to time to effect a reorganization of Government offices and services, but there were so many political interests involved, so much patronage threatened, that each time the effort failed and I fear it will fail again if left to Congress. The President, who is especially familiar with this situation, should be authorized to revamp the whole executive machinery. After all, it is his job. He is our Chief Executive.

Let me cite you a few instances of how our expenses have jumped up in five years. I will give you round figures. Take the Department of Agriculture. In 1927 it cost one hundred and fifty-six millions; in 1932 the cost had risen to three hundred and thirty-three millions, an increase of one hundred and seventy-seven millions. Then add the Farm Board outlay of one hundred and fifty-five millions, making the total increase on account of agriculture three hundred and thirty-two millions. The Post Office deficit—deficit, mind you—jumped from twenty-seven millions in 1927 to one hundred and ninety-five millions in five years. The Treasury Department doubled its expenditures in that time from one hundred and fifty millions to over three hundred millions. The War Department increased its outlay by one hundred and twenty-three millions and the Navy Department by sixty millions. The Shipping Board tripled its expenditures, and the Department of Justice more than doubled its demands. The Department of Commerce went from thirty millions to over fifty-four millions. The soldiers'-bonus fund went from one hundred and fifteen millions to two hundred millions, and the veterans and pensions outlay increased over one hundred and sixty-eight millions in addition. In short, the Federal Government's expenses increased in five years over a billion and a quarter dollars.

It is claimed that the comparison of governmental expenditures for the years 1927 and 1932 is unfair because, due to the unemployment situation last year, there were extraordinary appropriations for public buildings, highways, etc., and that if the figures of 1933 are compared with 1927 they will show an increase of only $750,000,000 in five years. No one yet knows what the 1933 Budget of expenditures will show. But even admitting that they will be kept down to an increase of three-quarters of a billion over 1927, I say it is too much. Instead of an increase there should be a decrease by that amount at least.

The United States Government will close the present fiscal year with a deficit of over $2,500,000,000. The so-called economy bill, when sent by the House to the Senate a few weeks ago, was a joke. When a manufacturer's sales tax was proposed, which would have helped greatly to balance the Budget and incidentally bring home to all of us a realization of what our Government costs, it was mobbed, and a hodge-podge of taxes of special incidence, which everybody knows will fall far short of our requirements, was substituted. In the hope of soaking the rich, income taxes were increased and may be still further increased. Everyone, except the few ornamental and accidental millionaires, will agree that those who have steadily or even suddenly profited by the rich and wonderful opportunities afforded in this country should pay proportionately, but it is well known that for the past three years incomes have been steadily dwindling, and will dwindle still more if there is not at Washington a clearer sense of the realities of our situation. While the rich should bear and do bear the greater proportion of our tax burden, they can not bear it all, and indeed, if we believe in democracy, should not bear it all.

Every thinking man, every man of heart in this country is preoccupied with the serious unemployment situation. It is estimated that 10,000,000 are out of work and millions more are working only part of the time. Great railroads are not earning any dividends and have difficulty in covering their fixed charges. Car loadings are at the lowest point for years. Industry generally is stagnating. Security prices are going down every day. The banks and insurance companies see their portfolios shrinking weekly. Invested capital, which means the savings of us all, is bringing less and less return. Farm produce and all commodities are selling at zero prices.

The only people not affected are those fortunate ones who are in public employment, those who draw their sustenance from the county, State, or National pay roll, many of whom are performing useless and extravagant services and whose dollars buy much more now than when their pay was fixed. There are too many useless jobs, too many luxury services, a too-lavish distribution of Government money to special groups and sections of our population. When times are out of joint, all sorts of quack remedies are proposed. If our industries, overstimulated by the war years when we were practically the only great country not occupied in wasting our substance, are overbuilt and overmachined and overmanned, if the land produces too much wheat and cotton, the mines too much lead and copper, if in other words the machines and the land are turning out more than our producing classes and world demand can consume, what is to be done with our excess machine-eliminated man power? Shall the Government attempt to revive industry by artificially providing work and thus make markets for our farm and other products and avoid a social and political cataclysm? A solution along these lines entailing more strain on our Government credit is now being seriously discussed. Everyone knows that borrowing is the easiest road to bankruptcy for nations as for individuals, but it is argued that such loans or credit advances as may be necessary in this connection will be self-liquidating; that they will be for productive enterprises like a tunnel under the East River in New York, improvements in living conditions in our crowded tenement districts, bridges, etc., which private capital after the disastrous experience of the past few years, is now afraid to undertake. Furthermore, it is said that in the present crisis their is no practical alternative; that it is the best way to avoid a winter of discontent and acute distress; that you can not take men and their families away from the cities and factories and get them back on the land; that the efforts of private charity, splendid as they have been, are no longer able to cope with the unemployment situation; that the States and cities are at the end of their resources; that Government exists for the people and not the people for the Government, and that, therefore, the National Government must provide a few extra billions in credit or cash in order to restart the industrial machine and provide work, or there will be no Government. Extreme pessimists fear we must choose between salvaging the capitalistic system or communism.

When the political leaders of both parties, with the approval, if not, indeed, the inspiration of leading industrialists, seem united in pushing to rapid adoption a plan of such far-reaching assistance to industry and agriculture, with provisions for unemployment relief to be handled by the various States, it may seem ridiculous that one who does not claim to be either an economist or politician should question the wisdom of this governmental underwriting of business, this further administration of oxygen, this new transfusion of blood. Nevertheless, I do not hesitate to say that I do not believe in either the wisdom or the efficacy of these artificial stimulants. We are creating a dangerous precedent and this proposed indirect dole to industry and agriculture will leave us as badly off at the end of the year as we are now and no nearer a fundamental solution of our difficulty. This, it seems to me, has been governmental extravagance, overtaxation, unrestrained overdevelopment of our industry, overconcentration of population in and about the industrial centers and overproduction of goods and commodities generally. If this serious step is going to be taken it should be accompanied, in my opinion, by a thorough, impartial, and comprehensive survey and study of our whole industrial system. Let us find out what is the matter and why these extraordinary measures are necessary, and then set about to correct it.

In discussing this scheme all say that the Budget must first be balanced, but when a Senator from one of our great States characterizes balancing the Budget as a "euphonious aphorism" and when we have seen how difficult it has been to make any real progress in that direction, one becomes skeptical. Naturally, everyone will agree that an adequate plan of relief should be carefully worked out if necessary to prevent suffering and starvation of our people, but in view of the experience of the past two years with the bonus and vast expenditures on public works, all designed to revive business and none succeeding, I believe that relief in whatever form it may be voted should be administered by or through responsible Federal agencies held to a strict accounting for every dollar. This will avoid competition and crowding at the public trough by States and especially by municipalities, many of which are now in financial difficulties for reasons pretty generally known. It may or at least should eliminate political pressure and influence in allocation and above all in distribution of the relief funds. But, I repeat, all this is merely treating symptoms and does not solve or make any provision for the solution of the basic causes of our present plight.

What has taken place in Congress in the past few months, its want of discipline and lack of a sense of its great responsibility in this crisis, is seriously undermining our democratic faith. It has seemed to the average citizen that the obvious steps to take were first to cut down the swollen expenses of government; second, to resist all new charges on the Treasury which were not necessary in the name of humanity; and lastly to levy on a broad, democratic basis the taxes required to balance the Budget. Unfortunately, it is now feared that Congress will not really balance the Budget but will even add, directly or indirectly, still further to our debt and tax burden.

I had thought to make some reference to-day to foreign affairs, reparations, war debt, tariffs and import restrictions, disarmament, and so forth. They are all important subjects and all connected with business recovery here and abroad, but just now they are secondary. Our first and most important duty is to put our own house in order. The faith and credit of the United States are at stake. If our Budget is not balanced and our national credit safeguarded our international prestige and influence and power for good will vanish.

On this field our fathers fought, that under God this Nation should have a new birth of freedom. They triumphed. It is for us, as Lincoln said, to prove their great sacrifice was not made in vain. We can prove it, not by dull acquiescence, with occasional outbursts of indignation, but by a steady and active interest in public affairs, and constant pressure of public opinion on Washington. Our American life to-day is more complex, our interests are more diffuse and intertwined than was ever dreamed of by any political philosopher. With a vast empire, with every variety of climate, with almost every racial strain in our population, we have the hardest task that ever confronted a democracy. Representative government, parliamentary government it is called in Europe, has in many countries been challenged and successfully overthrown and supplanted by military or semimilitary dictatorships, or has degenerated into communism. Even in England, the birthplace of free government in the modern world, stability and national welfare could be guaranteed only by a political truce and a coalition government.

And so again, I say, if we are to emerge from this crisis with our credit, our good name, our international influence, and our cherished institutions intact, we must make our representatives in Congress realize that they hold in their hands not only the fate of this country, but the fate of the democratic system everywhere. If we meet the test, this present time of depression and gloom may come to be regarded as one of the greatest blessings this country has ever had. We are going too fast. Not only was government too extravagant but industry and finance went completely and speculatively mad in the boom years. The future of the United States in bricks and mortar, in farms and factories, in copper, wheat, cotton, iron, and steel, in all the thousand and one forms of national activity and production was discounted and sold in advance, sometimes wholesale, and sometimes in installments. Billions were recklessly lent abroad by our bankers, and foreign securities now sadly shrunk in value have been scattered over the Nation. But dark days preceded and dark days followed the great battle fought here. The country did not waver then. I do not think, with leadership and clear-eyed courage, it will waver now. These are stirring times; they call for the same quality of courage to lead and courage to follow as Lincoln and our fathers showed in the dark days of the Civil War. They did not take the easy way.

This, my fellow citizens, is a solemn occasion. On this day, because we are met on this historic field, we review in our minds the struggles and vicissitudes of four years of fratricidal strife. We see Lee's great army of splendid soldiers cross the Potomac and bring the war home to us. We see the gallant charge of Pickett's men across yonder fields break itself to pieces against the Federal defenses on Cemetery Hill. We recall what our heroes, who lie about us, and their comrades, most of whom now sleep on the peaceful hillsides of our broad land, did here and on the hundred other battlefields of the Civil War. Our hearts are full of gratitude and reverence. We hear again to-day Lincoln's simple, solemn, sublime confession of his democratic faith.

Are we and our representatives in State and Nation worthy of their sacrifice? Shall we of this day and generation justify his faith?

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 408) providing for the filling of vacancies in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution of the class other than Members of Congress, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Library.

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs of the Seventy-first Congress, on May 29, 1930, reported a bill favoring the independence of the Philippine Islands. In the Seventy-second Congress, on February 24, 1932, the same committee after long hearings, reported a similar bill. On March 15, 1932, the House committee reported a bill with, as I understand it, only 2 members dissenting out of 21 members of the committee. The House passed this bill on April 4 with only 47 dissenting votes. The bill was reported to the Senate the following day and substituted for the Senate bill. So the record of the legislation is that the Senate has had before it for two years recommendations of its committee in two sessions of Congress for the independence of the Philippines.

The friends of this measure have realized very fully the distressed condition of our country. We have not occupied the time of the Senate, we have not interposed any dilatory tactics, but we believe that this matter should be settled at the present session of the Congress. On the 25th of May last the distinguished Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY], the Democratic leader, the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM], who is chairman of the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, and the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], who has a substitute pending, all agreed that this matter should be given consideration and disposed of at this session.

Mr. President, pursuing our policy of not interrupting the business before the Senate, I desire to ask unanimous consent that the Senate consider on next Monday and Tuesday nights the subject of Philippine independence. I ask that the request, which I have reduced to writing, may be read at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). The Senator from Missouri presents a proposed unanimous-consent agreement, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk reads as follows:

Ordered, by unanimous consent, That when the Senate concludes its business to-day it recess until 11 o'clock a. m. Monday, June 20; that at the hour of 7 o'clock p. m. on said day the unfinished business, if any, be temporarily laid aside and the Senate thereupon proceed with the consideration of Calendar No. 630, the bill H. R. 7233, the Philippine independence bill, and continue the same until not later than 10.30, unless it shall sooner be disposed of; that if the said bill is not disposed of by that time, the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock a. m. Tuesday, May 21; that at the hour of 7 o'clock p. m. on said day, the unfinished business, if any, be temporarily laid aside and the Senate thereupon again proceed with the consideration of Calendar No. 630, the bill H. R. 7233, the Philippine independence bill, and continue the same until not later than 10.30 o'clock p. m. unless it be sooner disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I desire to say that it seems to me that we lose all sense of proportion when at the end of a session already crowded with measures of great importance to our country we are asked to turn aside to spend the energy of Senators and the time of the Senate for two evenings to consider this particular legislation. If I understand the terms of the bill, the Filipinos will have to wait 20 years for their freedom, anyway, and if they had to 20 years and 6 months, it would not make much difference.

Mr. President, I am quite unwilling, with a relief bill pending, a home loan bank bill pending, and various appropriation bills and conference reports pending, that we should take two evenings of our precious time in the closing week of the session to devote to this particular enterprise. I have no objection to having one evening set apart; I am willing to give my physical energy and time, so far as I am concerned, for that purpose; but I can not conceive it necessary that we should occupy two evenings to carry on further discussion of this particular subject. Therefore, Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, I am amazed that the Senator from New York, for his own personal convenience, should object to the consideration of a bill that has the approval of three great farm organizations of America, of the national dairy organizations of America, of union labor, of all those Senators from the Pacific coast who are interested in the restriction of immigration, and of the American Legion.

Mr. President, if the Senator from New York had read the report of the committee or the evidence heard before three committees, he would know that, with only two exceptions, every witness agreed that a condition of uncertainty exists which is harmful to American interests, and not only harmful but paralyzing to Philippine affairs. The Filipinos can not adjust themselves economically or politically until Congress decides this question.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. HAWES. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I do not think the able Senator from Missouri understands the situation. The Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] objected to coupling Tuesday with Monday, but he has no objection to Monday evening being devoted to the consideration of the Philippine independence bill. Would not that satisfy the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HAWES. If that is the best the generous Senator from New York will give to the 13,000,000 people of the Philippine Islands and the great organizations to which I have referred, I suppose I must acquiesce. It was my understanding that the Senator from New York had a constitutional question which he desired to discuss, and one of the reasons why I wanted two evenings for the consideration of the bill was in order to give the Senator from New York all the time he might require in discussing the constitutional question.

Mr. McNARY. I understand the able Senator from New York is willing that the Senate should sit one evening for the purpose indicated by the Senator from Missouri, and I suggest that the Senator accept a compromise to the effect that on Monday evening the session from 7 o'clock until 11 o'clock be devoted to the consideration of the Philippine independence measure.

Mr. HAWES. I know the Senator from Oregon is a friend of Philippine independence and wants a vote on the question at this session of Congress. I yield to the suggestion that Monday evening be devoted to the consideration of the measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from Missouri modifies his request in accordance with the suggestion of the Senator from Oregon. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Missouri as modified?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I did not quite like what the Senator from Missouri said about my friendliness for the 13,000,000 people in the Philippines. I am interested in the 120,000,000 people in the United States who own this property. We have no right to alienate the sovereignty of the Philippines without the permission of the people. It is because of my interest in them that I have asked that the subject might be deferred. However, I have no objection to the present proposal of having Monday evening spent in the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As the Chair understands, the request is that the session for that purpose shall last from 7 o'clock to 10.30 on Monday evening. Is there objection?

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I should like to have the proposal, as modified, read at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, by unanimous consent, That when the Senate concludes its business to-day it recess until 11 o'clock a. m. Monday, June 20; that at the hour of 7 o'clock p. m. on said day the unfinished business, if any, be temporarily laid aside and the Senate thereupon proceed with the consideration of Calendar No. 630, the bill H. R. 7233, the Philippine independence bill, and continue the same until not later than 10.30, unless it shall sooner be disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I have no objection to the Philippine Islands independence bill being taken up and voted upon in the regular way; that is, by moving that it be taken up for consideration. I do not feel, however, in view of the matters pending before us and pressing for consideration, that we are justified in making a special order of the bill referred to until it comes up in the regular way. Therefore I shall have to object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. HAWES. Then, Mr. President, I shall make another request for unanimous consent. I send the request to the desk and ask that it may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, by unanimous consent, That immediately upon the disposition of the bill H. R. 12445 the Senate shall proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 630, the bill H. R. 7233, to enable the people of the Philippine Islands to adopt a constitution and form a government for the Philippine Islands, to provide for the independence of the same, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I object.

Mr. COPELAND. It is not quite clear to me what the request is. I understand that objection is made to the request for unanimous consent?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] objected.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11897) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes, requested a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. COLLINS, Mr. WRIGHT, Mr. PARKS, Mr. BARBOUR, and Mr. CLAGUE were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11897) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, that it agree to the conference asked by the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the Vice President appointed Mr. REED, Mr. JONES, Mr. CUTTING, Mr. KENDRICK, and Mr. MCKELLAR the conferees on the part of the Senate.

LOANS TO STATES—SYSTEM OF HIGHWAYS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12445) to relieve destitution, to broaden the lending powers of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and to create employment by authorizing and expediting a public-works program and providing a method of financing such program, which had been reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That (a) the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered to make loans (1) to States, municipalities and political subdivisions of States, public agencies of States, of municipalities, and of political subdivisions of States, public or quasi-public corporations, and public or quasi-public municipal instrumentalities of one or more States to aid in financing projects authorized under State or municipal law and which are self-liquidating in character, such loans to be made through the purchase of their securities, or otherwise, and for such purpose the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized to bid for such securities; and (2) to private corporations to aid in carrying out the construction of bridges, tunnels, docks, viaducts, waterworks, and similar projects devoted to public use and which are self-liquidating in character. The aggregate amount of such loans shall not exceed $1,460,000,000. Such loans shall be made under such terms and conditions, with such security, and in such amounts and for such periods (not exceeding 10 years), as the Reconstruction Finance Corporation may prescribe. For the purposes of this subdivision a project shall be deemed to be self-liquidating if such project will be made self-supporting and financially solvent and if the construction cost thereof will be returned within a reasonable period by means of tolls, fees, rents, or other charges. The provisions of this subdivision shall apply with respect to projects in Puerto Rico to the same extent as in the case of projects in the several States, and as used in this subdivision the term "States" includes Puerto Rico.

(b) The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and directed to advance to the Secretary of Agriculture, in addition to the amounts allocated and made available to him by section 2 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act, not to exceed $40,000,000, of the amounts made available under section 2 of this act, for the purpose of financing sales of agricultural products in the markets of foreign countries in which such sales can not be financed in the normal course of commerce, but no such sales shall be financed by the Secretary of Agriculture if, in his judgment, such sales will affect adversely the world markets for such products. Any loan or advance made by the Secretary of Agriculture for the purposes of this subdivision may be made with or without security, as the Secretary of Agriculture deems advisable.

(c) All amounts received by the corporation in repayment of any loan or advance under the provisions of this section shall be used exclusively for the purpose of retiring its notes, bonds, debentures, and other such obligations, the proceeds of which are made available for carrying out the provisions of this section.

SEC. 2. (a) For the purpose of providing funds for carrying out the provisions of section 1 of this act the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered to issue its notes, bonds, debentures, or other such obligations in an aggregate amount of not to exceed $1,500,000,000. Except as to dates of maturity, which may be fixed by the corporation at not to exceed 10 years, such notes, bonds, debentures, or other such obligations shall, so far as practicable, be issued in the same manner and be subject to the same terms and conditions as the notes, bonds, debentures, or other such obligations issued pursuant to section 9 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act.

(b) No loan shall be made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation under section 1 of this act to any financial institution, corporation, railroad, or other association or organization of a class to which loans may be made under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act.

(c) The Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall submit monthly to the President and to the Senate and the House of Representatives (or the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, if those bodies are not in session) a report of its activities and expenditures under section 1 of this act, together with a statement showing the loans and advances approved by it. Such reports shall, when submitted, be printed as public documents.

SEC. 3. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered to make loans under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act to financial institutions, corporations, railroads, and other associations specified in section 5 of such act, organized under the laws of Puerto Rico.

SEC. 4. (a) For the purpose of providing for emergency construction of certain authorized public works with a view to increasing employment and carrying out the policy declared in the employment stabilization act of 1931, there is hereby appropriated, from the emergency construction fund hereinafter created, the sum of $500,000,000, which shall be allocated as follows:

(1) For expenditure in emergency construction on the Federal-aid highway system, $120,000,000. Such sum shall be apportioned by the Secretary of Agriculture to the several States by the method provided in section 21 of the Federal highway act, as amended and supplemented (U. S. C., title 23, sec. 21). The amounts apportioned to the States shall be available as a temporary advance of funds to meet the provisions of such act as to State funds. The amount apportioned to any State under this subdivision may be used to match the regular annual Federal-aid apportionments made to such State (including the one for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933), and when so used such amount shall be available for expenditure in paying the share of such State in the cost of Federal-aid projects. No amounts apportioned under this subdivision shall be advanced except for work on the Federal-aid highway system performed before July 1, 1933: Provided, That the amounts so advanced shall be reimbursed to the Federal Government over a period of 10 years, commencing with the fiscal year 1938, by making annual deductions from moneys payable under regular apportionments made from future authorizations for carrying out the provisions of such act, as amended and supplemented: Provided further, That all contracts involving the expenditure of such amounts shall contain provisions establishing minimum rates of wages, to be predetermined by the State highway department, which contractors shall pay to skilled and unskilled labor, and such minimum rates shall be stated in the invitation for bids and shall be included in proposals or bids for the work: And provided further, That in the expenditure of such amounts, the limitations upon highway construction, reconstruction, and bridges within municipalities contained in section 4 of the act approved May 21, 1928 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 23, sec. 6b), and the limitations contained in the Federal highway act, as amended and supplemented, upon payments per mile which may be made from Federal funds, shall not apply.

(2) For expenditure in emergency construction on public roads during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, $16,000,000, as follows: (A) For the construction and improvement of national-forest highways, $5,000,000; (B) for the construction and maintenance of roads, trails, bridges, fire lanes, etc., including the same objects specified under the heading "Improvement of national forests" in the agricultural appropriation act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, approved February 23, 1931 (46 Stat. 1242), $5,000,000; (C) for the construction, reconstruction, and improvement of roads and trails, inclusive of necessary bridges, in the national parks and national monuments under the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior, including areas to be established as national parks authorized under the act of May 22, 1926 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 16, secs. 403 to 403c), and under the act of May 25, 1926 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 16, secs. 404 to 404c), and national park and monument approach roads authorized by the act of January 31, 1931 (45 Stat. 1053), $3,000,000; (D) for construction and improvement of Indian reservation roads under the provisions of the act approved May 26, 1928 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 25, sec. 318a), $1,000,000; and (E) for the survey, construction, reconstruction, and maintenance of main roads through unappropriated or unreserved public lands, nontaxable Indian lands, or other Federal reservations other than the forest reservations, under the provisions of the act approved June 24, 1930 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 23, sec. 3), $2,000,000. The Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Interior, respectively, are authorized to make rules and regulations for carrying out the foregoing provisions of this section with a view to providing the maximum employment of local labor consistent with reasonable economy of construction.

(3) For the prosecution of river and harbor projects heretofore authorized, $30,000,000.

(4) For the prosecution of flood-control projects heretofore authorized, $15,500,000.

(5) For the continuation of construction of the Hoover Dam and incidental works, as authorized by the Boulder Canyon project act, approved December 21, 1928 (U. S. C., Supp. V., title 43, ch. 12A), $10,000,000.

(6) For the expenditure by the Department of Commerce for air navigation facilities, including equipment, $500,000.

For constructing or purchasing and equipping lighthouse tenders and light vessels for the Lighthouse Service as may be specifically approved by the Secretary of Commerce, $950,000, and for establishing and improving aids to navigation and other works as may be specifically approved by the Secretary of Commerce, $2,860,000.

For the engineering work of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, Department of Commerce, heretofore authorized, $1,250,000.

(7) For the construction of projects included in the report of the Federal Employment Stabilization Board, laid before the Senate January 25, 1932, which have heretofore been authorized or which do not require specific authorization, under the Bureau of Yards and Docks, Navy Department, $10,000,000, of which not to exceed $300,000 shall be available for the employment of classified personal services in the Bureau of Yards and Docks and in the field service to be engaged upon such work and to be in addition to employees otherwise provided for.

(8) For the emergency construction of public-buildings projects in the continental United States outside of the District of Columbia, to be selected by the Secretary of the Treasury from the allocated public-buildings projects specified in House Document No. 788, Seventy-first Congress, third session, for which no appropriations have been made, $100,000,000. Such projects shall be constructed within the estimated limit of cost specified in such document, and in selecting such projects preference shall be given to places where Government facilities are housed in rented buildings under leases which will expire on or before July 1, 1934, or which may be terminated on or prior to that date by the Government.

(9) The remainder of such sum of $500,000,000 shall be available for expenditure upon permanent improvement projects, to be selected by the President, for which appropriations have heretofore been made or shall be hereafter made for expenditures during the fiscal year 1932 or 1933.

(b) The unexpended balance of any sums heretofore or hereafter appropriated for expenditure during the fiscal year 1932 or 1933 upon projects selected under paragraph (9) of subdivision (a), shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

(c) No money shall be available for expenditure under this section except in connection with projects in the continental United States outside of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 5. (a) There is hereby created a special fund in the Treasury to be known as the emergency construction fund and to be administered by the Secretary of the Treasury. For the purpose of providing funds to carry out the provisions of section 4 of this act, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to borrow from time to time on the credit of the United States not to exceed $500,000,000, and to issue bonds therefor, to be known as emergency construction bonds, in such form as he may prescribe. Such bonds shall be in denominations of not less than $50, shall mature 25 years from the date of their issue, and shall bear interest at such rates as may be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, but not to exceed 4¼ per cent per annum. The principal and interest of such bonds shall be payable in United States gold coin of the present standard of value, and such bonds shall be exempt, both as to principal and interest, from all taxation (except estate, inheritance, and gift taxes, and surtaxes) now or hereafter imposed by the United States, by any Territory, dependency, or possession thereof, or by any State, county, municipality, or local taxing authority.

(b) Such bonds shall be first offered at not less than par, as a popular loan, under such regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury as will give all citizens of the United States an equal opportunity to participate therein. Any portion of the bonds so offered and not subscribed for may be otherwise disposed of by the Secretary of the Treasury at not less than par. No commissions shall be allowed or paid in connection with the sale or other disposition of any such bonds. All amounts derived from the sale of such bonds shall be paid into the emergency construction fund.

(c) There is hereby created in the Treasury a cumulative sinking fund for the retirement of the bonds issued under this section. The sinking fund and all additions thereto are hereby appropriated for the payment of such bonds at maturity, or for the redemption or purchase thereof before maturity by the Secretary of the Treasury at such prices and upon such terms and conditions as he shall prescribe, and shall be available until all such bonds are retired. The average cost of the bonds purchased shall not exceed par and accrued interest. Bonds purchased, redeemed, or paid out of the sinking fund shall be canceled and retired and shall not be reissued. For the sixth fiscal year after the issuance of any bonds under this section and for each fiscal year thereafter, until all such bonds are retired, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purposes of such sinking fund an amount equal to 5 per cent of the aggregate amount of such bonds outstanding on the first day of such fiscal year, and for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for each fiscal year thereafter, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purposes of such sinking fund, an amount equal to the interest payable on such bonds during such fiscal year. The Secretary of the Treasury shall submit to Congress at the beginning of each regular session (until all bonds issued under this section are retired) a report of the action taken under the authority contained in this section.

SEC. 6. All loans made and all contracts let for construction projects pursuant to this act shall be subject to the conditions that no convict labor shall be directly employed on such projects, and that, so far as practicable, except in executive and administrative positions, no person employed on such projects shall be permitted to work more than 30 hours in any one week.

SEC. 7. The last paragraph of section 6 of the Federal highway act, approved November 9, 1921, as amended and supplemented (U. S. C., title 23, sec. 6), is hereby amended to read as follows:

"Whenever provision has been made by any State for the completion and maintenance of 90 per cent of its system of primary or interstate and secondary or intercounty highways equal to 7 per cent of the total mileage of such State, as required by this act, said State, through its State highway department, by and with the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture, is hereby authorized to increase the mileage of the primary or interstate and secondary or intercounty systems by additional mileage equal to not more than 1 per cent of said total mileage of such State, and thereafter to make like increases in the mileage of said systems whenever provision has been made for the completion and maintenance of 90 per cent of the mileage of said systems previously authorized in accordance therewith."

SEC. 8. (a) A commission is hereby created to be known as the industrial commission, and to be composed as follows: 5 Members of the Senate, to be appointed by the President of the Senate; 5 Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker; and 9 other persons who shall fairly represent the various industries and employments of the United States, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

(b) It shall be the duty of the commission to investigate questions pertaining to agriculture, labor, manufacturing, and business, including domestic and foreign commerce, to report to Congress from time to time, and to recommend such legislation by the various States of the Union and the Congress as will harmonize conflicting interests and be equitable to the laborer, the employer, the producer, and the consumer, and which is calculated to revive trade and promote the general welfare. Upon the completion of its investigation the commission shall submit a final report to the Congress.

(c) The commission may hold hearings and, if necessary, it may appoint a subcommission or subcommissions of its own members to make investigations in any part of the United States; and it shall have authority to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths and affirmations, and to incur necessary expenses, including expenses for clerks, stenographers, messengers, rent for place of meeting, and printing and stationery, in an amount not to exceed $50,000 per annum for the purposes of this subdivision.

(d) The commission shall cease to exist upon the expiration of two years after the date of enactment of this act. The salary of each member of the commission appointed by the President shall be at the rate of $3,600 per annum. Each member of the commission shall be allowed his actual traveling expenses.

(e) Any vacancy occurring in the commission by reason of death, disability, or any other cause shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointment.

(f) A sum sufficient to carry out the provisions of this section is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 9. This act may be cited as the "Emergency construction and relief act of 1932."

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I submit certain amendments to the pending bill and ask that they may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Without objection, the amendments will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, before I proceed I should like to have read at the desk a letter received by me this morning from Mr. W. H. Matthews, who is director of the Emergency Work Bureau of the City of New York, and who is in charge therefore of relief work in that city. The letter is in response to an invitation to appear on Monday morning before the Committee on Manufactures on the subject of unemployment relief. It is first-hand information, and I think it will be interesting and enlightening to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

THE A. I. C. P.,
New York, June 17, 1932.

Hon. ROBERT F. WAGNER,
United States Senator, Senate Building,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR WAGNER: Most sincerely do I wish that I might be present at the hearing to be held on Monday morning. If one week could be worse than any one of the last four, then this past one has certainly been the worst. A constant stream of people in utmost distress, going from place to place in an effort to get food, to save themselves from eviction and receiving everywhere the same answer, "We can not take care of any new applications." "Half crazy with worry," "Up against a blank wall and don't know which way to turn," "Have been fighting against this thing now for months and can't go on any longer"—these, and other like expressions, are the burden of so many letters that are coming to us. "Work—any kind that will give me a chance to earn something to keep my wife and children fed"—this is the cry of thousands of men whose love of family is just as deep and strong as that of any group of men in the land.

What you and others are proposing now should have been done a year—two years ago. This week we have been holding clinics for the physical examination of children whom we hope to send to summer camps as soon as school closes. "Badly undernourished" appears over the doctor's signature on almost every card. Oh, it is a terrible toll that is being exacted of these children.

Added to that is the ever-increasing despair, hopelessness, and bitterness of men and women who ask only for the chance to earn by work the bare necessities of life.

Do, I beg of you, add my plea to that of others in behalf of these who suffer beyond words.

Most sincerely yours,

W. H. MATTHEWS,
Director Emergency Work Bureau.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. WAGNER. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. May I ask the Senator if, outside of private charity, the great and rich city of New York is not furnishing ample accommodation and sufficient food for all who are hungry in that city?

Mr. WAGNER. The letter speaks for itself.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. True; it is a terrible indictment of municipal government that it is possible for people to be hungry in any city in America.

Mr. WAGNER. I think if the Senator will examine into the facts he will find that similar conditions prevail in practically all of the large cities of the country.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am proud to say that there is not a city or town in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts where there are persons known to be without food. There are people suffering and sacrificing, and people who need more food, and many unemployed, but the public authorities and private charities are providing ample food for those who really need it and ask for it.

Mr. WAGNER. I am sure the government of New York is doing everything within its power to alleviate this tragic condition, but it must be remembered that in times like these New York is a mecca for thousands of people from all over the country, who come there to seek the aid which they can not receive in their own communities.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I realize that; and I am aware of some very excellent charities and activities in New York that are supplying food through food kitchens and other private sources, but I can not understand, I repeat, how the authorities of any city can allow a single person living within its confines to be hungry while there is a dollar in the public treasury. The primary obligation of all local governments is, above all other activities, to care for those in want and need.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, with the indulgence of the Senate, I should like to explain in a general way, but I hope not in a lengthy way, the provisions of the bill which is now under consideration, referred to as the unemployment relief bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. Would the Senator object to my asking unanimous consent for the consideration of the executive and independent offices appropriation bill?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah repeat his request? I could not completely understand it.

Mr. SMOOT. I was asking the Senator from New York if he would object to my asking unanimous consent to have considered at this time House bill 10022, the appropriation bill for the Executive Office and sundry independent offices.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I suppose it is implied that the pending bill will be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly. I merely wanted to know whether the Senator would consent to the bill being temporarily laid aside for the consideration of the appropriation bill.

Mr. WAGNER. I understand that the consideration of this bill will consume several days; and I think the pending legislation is so important that it ought not to be even temporarily laid aside.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator, then, does not desire to have it done?

Mr. WAGNER. Not at this time. Undoubtedly after this general statement is made we shall go into the details of the bill, when the amendments to the bill and the merits will be considered more in detail.

Mr. President, I hope the Senate will be indulgent with me for intruding with a personal reference into the discussion of this vital legislation.

Several days ago the Senate passed the relief bill of which I had the honor to be one of the authors. During the consideration of that bill for the relief of distress among our citizens the very able Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] uttered a remark which attracted considerable attention. He said:

I believe that the historian of the future who writes, perhaps, upon the decline and fall of the American Republic will point to to-day as one of the milestones upon the road to disintegration of this Government.

Mr. President, that sentence recalled to my mind a very similar scene enacted some 20 years ago in the New York State Senate. On that occasion, too, the violent charge was directed against a measure I advocated that it worked the undoing of the State I represented. We had then just completed an extensive investigation of industrial conditions. We had found a state of affairs which endangered the health, safety, and morals of our citizens. We proposed corrective legislation which was founded on the premise that it was the duty of the State to protect its citizens against the unwarranted hazards to which they were exposed in the course of their honorable effort to earn a livelihood, and that the government was not powerless to discharge that duty.

As that legislation was about to pass my distinguished adversary of that day very solemnly proclaimed the day as "red-letter day" and prophesied that the enactment of the legislation would lead to the disintegration of the American Republic. The law to which he referred, Mr. President, became the nucleus of the factory code of the State of New York, which has become the model and guide for similar legislation in all the States of the Union.

To-day the American flag still flies from the dome of our State capitol; and I am pleased to believe that that humane, enlightened, and progressive legislation has helped to fasten it more firmly than ever to the masthead from which it waves.

No government, Mr. President, has, in my judgment, ever decayed or fallen because it has served the interest of all its citizens, the mighty and the humble alike, with earnestness and devotion. But the dust of ages is composed of the remains of once-glorious civilizations whose rulers wined in gilded places while the great masses of their people were hungry for bread.

For three long years we have allowed the scourge of economic depression to whip millions of our citizens into a misery which words can not portray—into an agony of body and soul as their children go cold and hungry. It is, to my mind, not at all surprising that many of us, both inside and outside of Congress, should be perplexed as to the course to follow. The road ahead is by no means clear. But surely when that is the case we do not serve the national purpose by waiting upon some miracle to assuage the hunger of the destitute or open working opportunities for the idle.

The Department of Labor advises us that over a million families are eating the bread of charity, and these figures apply to but 124 cities containing less than a third of the population. These men, women, and children are not suffering the merited punishment of their own misconduct. They are the victims of a national disaster; and their plight constitutes a national problem which imposes an equal responsibility upon the local, State, and Federal Governments.

Meanwhile the statistical reports published by the Government record the growing paralysis of business. Industrial production is still declining.

In March, 1930, it was 104. In March, 1931, it was 87. In March, 1932, it was 67.

These indices, published by the Federal Reserve Bulletin, reveal the extent to which the blood pressure has been reduced in the arteries of industry.

The number of freight-car loadings have been cut 60 per cent since January, 1930.

The volume of building contracts of all classes in March of 1931 was $370,000,000. In March, 1932, it was only $112,000,000.

Since the middle of 1929 prices have month after month continued their downward course without interruption.

In the month of April the total of pay rolls paid out in the factories of the United States amounted to but 44 cents for every dollar that was similarly paid out in 1926.

The figures that I have cited reveal the unprecedented violence of the present business disturbance. It is nevertheless true that depressions are no new experience. Every American generation during the past century has been tested by the fire of at least one major depression. We should have learned something from that experience. Apparently we have not. In the midst of the present situation we are still debating fundamental questions, still doubting first principles.

In the past it has been our habit to let the depression work its havoc with unresisted fury until the recuperative powers of the Nation slowly restored it to health. Following such a course in the past, when the country was largely agricultural, was by no means as serious in its consequences as its pursuit at the present time, when our people are largely urban and industrialized. To-day such a policy involves intense suffering, widespread destitution, physical deterioration, and impairment of morale.

During the past few years a number of efforts have been made which were intended to check the decline. The methods employed were directed toward the stimulation of confidence and the liberalization of credit. These methods have proved insufficient. Confidence was not restored through exhortation; business has not revived in response to the efforts to create more ample credit facilities. It is not difficult to ascertain the reason. When these methods were proposed I expressed the opinion that they were inadequate. They were not aimed at the sore spot of the present situation.

Business men can not operate with confidence as long as prices continue to decline. Business can not resume its stride except in response to a demand for commodities by persons who have the price to pay. Such a demand can not originate as long as hundreds of thousands are destitute and millions of families are without wages. Normal expenditures, even by those at work, can not be expected as long as the prospect of continued employment is uncertain.

How can we break through the impasse created when business waits upon the resumption of demand and demand waits upon the resumption of employment? We have not blasted through that impasse by simply waiting for business to take the initiative. It is now the obligation of the Government to act.

Our problems are to create a demand for commodities, so as to help check further price decline, and to create a demand for labor so as to make purchasing power available in the hands of those who need it most urgently and will use it most completely.

Both of these objectives can be reached by launching a nation-wide program of necessary and productive construction.

The bill which is before the Senate to-day presents a specific proposal for carrying such a program into effect. It contemplates the investment of $2,000,000,000 in enterprises affected with a public interest. Of that sum, one and one-half billion dollars is to be raised through the issuance of Reconstruction Finance Corporation securities, and all but $40,000,000 of it is to be employed in financing the construction of income-producing, self-liquidating projects of a public character by States, municipalities, public agencies, and private corporations. Forty million dollars is to be held available for the Secretary of Agriculture to aid in financing agriculture exports where such action would not adversely affect world prices. Five hundred million dollars is to be raised through the issuance of Federal securities to finance an expansion of the Federal construction program.

Before going into the detailed classification of the local and Federal projects to be constructed under the bill, I desire to state the principles which guided the authors of the bill in making their selections. Undoubtedly my colleagues will discuss these provisions more in detail.

First. We desired projects that were readily available and capable of giving prompt employment to large numbers of men.

Second. We insisted that the projects should not add to the already excessive plant capacity of private industry nor aggravate the condition of overintense competition now prevailing in business.

Third. We restricted the projects to be financed with public money to those which are affected with a public interest.

Fourth. We selected projects that are useful and productive, and certain to satisfy a prospective demand.

The outlay of funds for the purpose of financing such a program is not extravagance, but the utmost of prudent economy. It constitutes not an expenditure of income, but an investment of capital. We may be perfectly sure that this depression will not be conquered by tying a rope of panic around every purse. We can not win by continuing the disorderly retreat. It is time to stand our ground and arm to meet the enemy with the only weapon to which he is vulnerable—a program of investment which will create a demand for commodities, labor, and credit, and put purchasing power in the hands of those who will use it to create a supplemental demand for more commodities, labor, and credit.

It may be that our program is not large enough. In so far as it applies to local projects, our undertaking can be enlarged as the need develops. In so far as it applies to the Federal program we must wait before further expension is possible because we have not yet planned sufficiently ahead to render feasible any immediate increase beyond that contained in the bill.

The proposals which I am now discussing have already received widespread public consideration. There is practically unanimous approval of that portion of our bill which authorizes the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to finance local self-liquidating projects of a public character. Under that provision $1,460,000,000 will be made available for the construction of bridges, docks, tunnels, waterworks, and similar undertakings of a public character. Whether prosecuted by public agencies or by private corporations, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation must be satisfied in each instance that the project will be made self-supporting and that the construction cost will be returned within a reasonable period by means of tolls, fees, rents, or other charges.

The only criticism I have heard concerning that portion of the bill is addressed to the action of the committee which rendered limited dividend corporations engaged in housing and slum-clearance projects ineligible to receive loans from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

When we consider the committee amendments I shall attempt to persuade the Senate that limited-dividend corporations engaged in low-cost housing construction, which are self-liquidating in character, properly belong within the scope and purposes of the bill.

For the present time I desire to address myself to that portion of the bill which has become controversial, the section which provides for an expanded program of Federal construction.

It is well to remember that most of the criticism which has heretofore been leveled against the Federal construction proposal was expressed before this bill was introduced and before the specific schedule of projects which it contains was known. Since its introduction, many who found fault with such a proposal in the abstract have commended and approved it.

The question before the Senate as I see it, Mr. President, is not whether we subscribe to the general doctrine that public works should be timed for construction during periods of depression. The Congress declared its policy in that regard when it enacted the employment stabilization act of 1931. The genuine question is whether an outlay of Federal money is justified for the specific purposes set forth in the bill. And that question can only be answered by subjecting each of the undertakings proposed in the bill to the test whether in the judgment of prudent business men it is a justifiable investment.

Item 1 in the list of Federal projects consists of $120,000,000 to be advanced to the States and returned by the States to the Federal Government. That will be explained in detail by the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN]. The money is to be used by the States to meet their share of the cost of road construction on the Federal-aid highway system. This advance will make possible the continuation of the road program scheduled for the coming year without curtailment for lack of State funds.

The public road system of the country is one of its greatest assets. That the construction of roads constitutes an investment requires little proof at this time. Every gasoline station has become a toll house and every road a revenue producer. I am informed that gasoline taxes collected in 1931 amounted to $536,397,458. That was in fact the price paid by the motorists for the use of our highways. The public highway system is a productive enterprise in the fullest sense of the word. Its construction should certainly go forward now, when costs are low and when the working opportunities it will open will be a blessing to the Nation.

The same arguments apply to item 2, which makes $16,000,000 available for Federal road construction.

Items 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7 will permit an expansion and acceleration of the work already authorized and planned for river and harbor improvements, flood control, air navigation, Lighthouse Service, Coast and Geodetic Survey, yards and docks, and Hoover Dam. No attempt has been made to specify the particular river to be improved or the specific lighthouse to be erected. That has been left to the executive departments. It is expected that with the funds made available they will promote precisely the same class of undertakings as are recommended by the President in the Budget and for which appropriations are carried in the current appropriation bills.

The river and harbor work and the Lighthouse Service constitute essential betterments of the Nation's transportation system. They pay for themselves in reduced cost of doing business and in lower freight charges. Only the most deadly pessimist would assume that the need for continued improvement of these arteries of trade has ceased. The Budget submitted by the President contains requests for funds for these very purposes. If it be unwise to prosecute such work, then the budgetary requests ought likewise to be denied. No one would seriously hold that position.

The havoc caused by the last overflowing of the Mississippi River is still too fresh in our memories to permit us to regard the flood-control expenditure as anything but a sound investment. The sooner the whole authorized project is completed the better. Now is the time to expand this employment-giving work to the maximum.

Hoover Dam clearly falls into the class of revenue-producing projects. The Interior Department appropriation bill carries an item of $6,000,000 for that purpose. The additional $10,000,000 made available in this bill will permit the normal progress of that gigantic undertaking.

The amount specified for each of the construction agencies I have mentioned was arrived at after consultation with the executive departments and is that which can be efficiently and promptly employed in the present emergency.

Item 8 is directed toward an expansion of the so-called public-buildings program and makes $100,000,000 available for that purpose. Every possible precaution has been taken to make certain that the buildings to be erected shall meet the test of being necessary for the Government's business. We have excluded from consideration building projects outside of continental United States because they will not provide the necessary employment. We have eliminated all projects in the District of Columbia because a large program of construction is already in progress at the Capitol. We have restricted the proposed buildings to a selection from among those which have already been recommended by the Departments of the Treasury and the Post Office. To these safeguards has been added the further provision that preference should be given to places where Government facilities are housed in rented quarters, under leases which expire on or before July 1, 1934, or which can be terminated before that date by reason of a cancellation clause. The final choice lies in every instance with the Secretary of the Treasury.

I regard this carefully protected program of building construction as a productive investment. The Federal Government needs buildings to house its activities. It is to-day paying out millions in rentals. I am informed that the Federal Government spends annually $7,918,533.12 for post-office leases alone where the individual rental is $6,000 or more per annum. Post-office leases of that class which terminate or can be made to terminate on or before July 1, 1934, require an annual expenditure of $4,495,740.68. To reduce that type of expenditure by taking advantage of the low production cost now prevailing is both prudent business and economical government.

The total of new Federal construction which can be undertaken under the bill is $307,060,000. In addition, under item 9, the President is authorized to employ the remaining $192,940,000 of the emergency construction fund for the construction of permanent improvements for which appropriations are carried in the current supply bills.

The entire program of Federal construction made possible under the bill constitutes, in my judgment, a moderate expansion of the building activities of the Government properly restricted and adequately safeguarded. It imposes upon the Federal Government a modest share of the burden of the present emergency and a portion of the responsibility for initiating the steps toward recovery. Once this bill is passed the Federal work can go forward. No local legislative action can hinder it. No investigation by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is necessary before it can be launched. The Federal construction is that part of the $2,000,000,000 program from which we can expect the earliest results.

The issue has been raised, Mr. President, that the Federal construction section of the bill will provide but an insubstantial amount of employment. That charge was made by the Secretary of the Treasury in the course of the committee hearings upon this bill. It is a serious charge. If it is true of the Federal public works, then it is equally true of State, municipal, and private construction. If this assertion has merit, it means not only is the Federal construction section of no avail but that the entire bill will fail of its purpose. That would be the logical consequence of the position taken by Mr. Mills. He finds it, however, perfectly consistent to approve of three-fourths of the bill on the ground that it would afford employment, and to condemn the remaining quarter on the ground that it would not. Surely nothing can be plainer than that the construction of a municipal dock will provide no more and no less employment than the construction of a Federal dock.

At the hearings on June 2 Mr. Mills made a startling statement in reference to the $100,000,000 set aside for building construction. He said:

> In the course of the next 12 months that would provide work for 10,400 men at the maximum.

He repeated that statement at the hearing on June 7, when he said:

> I am no expert on this river and harbor work. I do know that the Senator's $100,000,000 for public buildings would have given work to just about 10,000 men directly and indirectly during the next 12 months, and those figures can not be challenged.

Fortunately, Mr. President, those figures were challenged, and after considerable talk it was revealed that what Mr. Mills had in mind was that he would spend only $26,000,000 out of the $100,000,000—and half of that for sites—and that the net remainder of $13,000,000 would give employment to 10,000 men.

I am sure, Mr. President, that Mr. Mills had no desire to mislead the committee. The inadvertence was caused, however, in my judgment, by an unconscious effort to belittle the effectiveness of this legislation.

It is exceedingly difficult to foretell with precision how many working opportunities will be opened by the pending legislation. I have thus far shunned the responsibility of making an estimate. Nevertheless, in view of the issue raised by Mr. Mills, I have collected several pieces of evidence on that question which I desire to submit to the Senate:

First. On page 15 of the hearings before the Committee on Banking and Currency under date of June 2, Mr. Mills himself accepted as true the proposition that $120,000,000 spent on road construction would give employment to 100,000 men. That is, it would open 100,000 full-day, full-year jobs.

Second. Dr. Virgil Jordan, economist of the McGraw-Hill publications, stated in New York, on April 12, 1932, that a reduction of $1,500,000,000 in the amount of public construction would mean an increase of 1,000,000 men in the ranks of the unemployed. His statement appeared in the New York Times on April 13, 1932.

Third. Mr. J. A. Kelly, research director of the Electrical Guild of North America, in a communication dated June 3, 1932, advises that "about 700 men would be employed throughout the year for each $1,000,000 spent during that year for electrical-construction work."

There is no point in multiplying the corroborative testimony. Taking a conservative view of these figures, it is plain that the $2,000,000,000 program embraced in the bill should provide one and one-third millions of full-day, full-year jobs. By giving effect to the 30-hour-week clause contained in the bill we increase that number of working opportunities by 60 per cent. In round figures that means that we have the power to open at least 2,000,000 jobs. The Federal construction will, of course, be responsible for one-quarter of that. My only answer to Mr. Mills's contention that he can not get the part which devolves upon his department under way during the coming year is to refer to the act of March 31, 1930 (46 Stat. 137), which authorizes the employment of outside architects and engineers, and to the act of February 26, 1931 (46 Stat. 1421), which prescribes a very expeditious procedure for the acquisition of necessary sites and dispenses with the delays normally incident to condemnation proceedings.

In the figures which I have used consideration was, of course, given the well-known fact that the work of modern construction is not all done at the site. A major portion of the labor is performed in the mines and quarries, in the steel and lumber mills, in the electrical and machine shops in preparing the materials necessary for construction and upon the railroads in transporting them to location. As one witness well expressed it during the hearings before the Committee on Education and Labor—Mr. Fred E. Schmitt, editor of Engineering News-Record—"there are no materials of intrinsic preciousness which go into construction." Ultimately almost the entire outlay is spent in the form of wages and profits. These days the portion that goes to profit is very low, indeed.

So far I have spoken of the first effect of the construction dollar. It seems trite to repeat that the wages thus made available do not remain fallow with the workmen who receive them. They are spent and respent for the products of farm and factory, discharging at every purchase their trade-reviving and employment-giving function.

There is another issue involved in the pending bill that I desire to consider. Objection has been raised to the Federal-construction section of the bill, because it calls for a Federal bond issue. I recall that when the proposal for a bonded construction program was first launched the fantastic argument was used that such a bond issue could not be sold. That objection was short-lived. It could not survive in the presence of the record of huge oversubscriptions on every issue of Federal securities, both long term and short term.

We then heard the argument that the flotation of a Federal bond issue would divert capital from private enterprise. That argument, too, could not withstand the logic of the fact that the number of private-capital issues had shrunk to almost insignificant dimensions. In 1930, $4,483,000,000 of private corporate securities were issued. That volume shrank in 1931 to $1,550,000,000. In March of 1931 the volume was $259,000,000; in March of 1932 it was $48,000,000.

A new argument has, therefore, been contrived—the argument that the issuance of the Federal bonds would unbalance the Budget. Similarly the erection of the emergency construction fund is condemned as recourse to an "extraordinary budget."

It seems to me that we do not clarify the situation at all by simply playing with words. Of course, the issuance of Federal bonds constitutes borrowing. Likewise does the sale of Reconstruction Finance Corporation securities constitute borrowing. What gives value to both classes of securities is nothing else but the credit of the United States, which is equally behind them.

There can be no doubt that borrowing to pay current expenses would throw the Budget out of balance. That would be true irrespective of whether the borrowing was effected by the United States directly or through its agency, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. It is equally true that borrowing for the construction of permanent improvements is a capital investment and that the only item which enters the Budget of current income and outgo is the interest and amortization charges made necessary by the bond issue.

What I have said is in accord with general public practice. No private corporation reports a $10,000,000 deficit when it borrows that amount on long term for the purpose of financing the construction of a new plant. It would have been perfectly feasible to discharge all of the functions of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation through a bureau created for that purpose in the Treasury Department. In fact the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act makes provision that at the end of a stated period the Treasury Department shall take over the functions of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Had we dispensed altogether with the corporate structure it would none the less have been absurd to declare that every debenture issued by the Reconstruction Finance Bureau increased the Federal deficit and unbalanced the Budget. If we follow the reasoning of the Secretary of the Treasury, we should be compelled to conclude that that deficit has been avoided by the simple trick of writing the word "Corporation" after the words "Reconstruction Finance."

I can not believe that the stability of national finances depend upon such transparent devices.

It is my view, Mr. President, that the bill which is before us is entirely innocent of the charge that it unbalances the Budget. On the contrary, by eliminating $193,000,000 from current appropriations for permanent improvements and financing the construction of these improvements through the emergency construction fund, the bill actually helps to balance the Budget and reduces to that extent the present burden of taxation.

Mr. President, the time is more than ripe for the people of the United States to abandon their despair and throw their organized strength into the battle against depression. Through the program of construction proposed in this bill we can build an engine which will help pull us out of the slough in which we have been bogged for three long years. This bill has within it the promise of assistance in setting the wheels of private industry agoing, in causing the channels of trade once more to flow with the commerce of a busy people.

No such national attempt has ever before been made in a deliberate effort to check a depression. We can not lose, for the bridges we engineer, the buildings we erect will add to the permanent wealth of this Nation and we have the world to gain, for we shall contribute to the happiness of our people, conserve their character, and preserve their morale.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I believe that now is a most opportune time for the Government to proceed with a public-works program, but this work should, by all means, be administered on sound business principles. There should be no reckless and indiscriminate expenditure of public funds, as, for instance, the construction of a post office in a community where the maintenance of janitor service would cost in excess of the rent now being paid for postal quarters.

A large public-works program will stimulate business—stimulate it with effect that if the program is well worked out and over a period of years, that it will make every business man in America sharpen his pencil to do some figuring that will start the wheels of industry humming.

Most of our bonus marchers would not now be in Washington if they had work. I have talked to numbers of them. They are honest, fearless, straightforward Americans. It humiliates them to ask for relief in any form. They would rather work than take Government help. Yes; they prefer jobs to the bonus. They prefer jobs to any Government relief.

Mr. President, I am not going to make a lengthy address. There is not a Member of the Senate who is not familiar with the needs of the country, and this is not a time for speech making.

Relief has been and always will have to be extended to those who are known as America's needy. If we can stimulate business, it will enable generous-hearted men and women to make donations to that cause. Philanthropists and private charity have been giving about one-fourth of the relief, and the governments, either of State, county, or townships, have been paying practically all the rest. I am told by reliable authorities that there has been expended enough in direct relief to build a highway 120 feet wide from the extreme eastern to extreme western end of the country and from the extreme northern to the extreme southern end of the country.

A sane and practicable public-works program would be reflected advantageously to industry and labor. Construction work always means a stimulation of activity on the iron ranges; the mines; the limestone quarries; cement quarries; lumberyards; iron, steel, and metal foundries; and mills. A cycle of production induces a sympathetic cycle of purchases and sales, which is sincerely sought and sadly needed by the farmer and the merchant.

Not only are the men who work with pick and shovel suffering in this depression but so also are men and women accustomed to luxuries. Many are burdened with debt without the hope of relief. Philanthropists and capitalists who heretofore have made donations to community chests and charitable enterprises are now shorn of their wealth and can no longer make contributions.

Mr. President, it is time for us to begin immediately the work of devising ways and means to provide shelter and food for our unemployed veterans and their dependents during the coming winter. In this very situation there is an apt application of the saying, "In time of peace prepare for war." For the next four or five months we shall be enjoying fair weather. All able-bodied men and women can exist, even under makeshift conditions, through the summer time.

Mr. President, provision for the bitter, cold winter should be begun forthwith. I know what it means to be idle, to need work, to be a traveler, seeking work—yes, Mr. President, to be hungry and to be cold. Of all the discomforts of life, of all of the afflictions which can visit mankind, barren coldness is the most insufferable. History will disclose that uprisings against governments, rebellion against tyranny either occurred in the bitter snow-and-ice-swept months of the year or were born in chill weather.

So, Mr. President, if human misery is to be relieved, the Federal Government must and, I am sure, will do its part. What is there more important than to care for the unemployed? No matter what we may think of the Government extending relief, it must find a way to relieve human misery.

I wish to take this opportunity, Mr. President, to invite the attention of the Senate to House bill 4743, which was passed by the House on May 18, 1932, and was referred to the Senate Committee on Education and Labor, before which committee a hearing was held on June 3. The committee reported the bill favorably, and it is now on the Senate Calendar, being Order of Business No. 866.

It is most urgent that the pending bill be passed at this session of Congress, because—

First. The cooperating States must certify to their budget directors next November the amount of Federal allotments they will receive and must match them through appropriations to be made at the next sessions of their legislatures, which convene next January?

Second. Appropriations for allotment to the States for the fiscal year 1934 must be certified by the Federal Board for Vocational Education to the President and the Bureau of the Budget prior to December 1 next.

RECENT DEVELOPMENTS IN THE PROGRAM OF REHABILITATION

First, Mr. President, in spite of depressed business conditions, 31 per cent more persons were rehabilitated in 1931 than in the preceding year. In addition, 2,455 persons were trained and fitted for employment during that year.

Second. A total of 55,000 persons have been rehabilitated to date. Including their dependents, 150,000 persons have been made self-supporting and freed from dependency, relief, and public charity.

Third. During the year 1930-31 the States expended $921,626.98 from Federal funds and $1,098,024.76 from State funds.

Fourth. Forty State legislatures convened in January, 1931, 27 of them increasing their rehabilitation appropriations by the sum of $400,424.70. In 11 States appropriations remained the same and in 6 there were decreases amounting to $33,178.84. Thus the net increase in appropriations totaled $367,245.86.

Fifth. During the present year the cooperating States were allotted by the Federal Government all of the available money—$1,097,000—and were prepared to match $65,000 in addition.

Sixth. Despite the fact that a larger Federal appropriation is needed at this time to carry on the Federal-State programs, which have doubled in the number of persons needing rehabilitation in the last three years, the authorization of Federal funds in the pending bill has not been increased.

CONTINUED PARTICIPATION BY THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT IS NECESSARY BECAUSE—

First. At least 10 per cent of the people receiving rehabilitation service were injured while in the employ of the Federal Government—that is, ex-service men, Coast Guard men, longshoremen and harbor workers, men discharged from the Army and Navy, and civilian employees of the Government.

The present rehabilitation act makes it the responsibility of the States to rehabilitate all disabled employees of the Federal Government.

Second. Rehabilitation is more constructive and at the same time more economical than a dole or other form of public relief. The State-Federal rehabilitation program is the only service of organized government for the restoration of disabled persons to self-supporting employment.

Third. The average cost of rehabilitating one person is only two-thirds of the annual cost of supporting one public charge. Public charity therefore, including support of the dependents of the disabled person, is four and one-half times as expensive each year as the average cost of rehabilitating the person.

Fourth. Members of Congress familiar with the rehabilitation service have repeatedly made the statement that there is no Federal money expended which results in more constructive service or more benefit to the Nation than that expended for rehabilitation.

RESPONSIBILITY OF GOVERNMENT TO PROMOTE REHABILITATION

Social progress is slow, but we can measure the advancement of our civilization and of our Government by the extent to which we serve our physically handicapped. Citizenship in the United States has come to mean more than it means in any other country, at least for handicapped persons. The rehabilitation law has replaced the law of the survival of the fittest and the law of self-preservation. If we fail to continue this service now, which has been carried on for 12 years, when it is more needed by handicapped persons than at any other former time, it would be a backward step. It would be a repudiation of responsibility. It would appear to be a stepping on the oppressed when they are most severely afflicted.

Rehabilitation is an economical program, a program of constructive relief for the physically vocationally handicapped. Accident and disease are blighting individuals and their homes; and unless something is done to reconstruct these individuals and restore them to economic independence, we are in danger of permitting the development of antisocial attitudes on the part of a large group of persons.

If we withdraw Federal aid for rehabilitation work, persons who live in those States in which the service would stop would migrate to the few States which could serve them. It can only be an economic provision, therefore, for us to continue this constructive service.

Mr. President, it has been indicated that the cost of one rehabilitation is about two-thirds of the cost of one dependent. In one case we are dealing with social resources; in the other case we are dealing with dependency. Sociologists tell us that among the families which are dependent, one family in five is dependent because of the physical handicap of the family's breadwinner.

Our States and philanthropic agencies are giving millions of dollars a year to provide medical treatment for indigent people. They are spending additional millions to educate children who are handicapped. Therefore, if we do not complete the rehabilitation of disabled persons, we have not succeeded after all the investment that we have made. If a child is crippled, he is from birth to the age of 5 a medical problem; from 5 to 16 he is a medical and educational problem; when he reaches adult life, that is the age of employability, he becomes a threefold problem, namely, medical, educational, and vocational. Now, we are spending millions of dollars for material rehabilitation. Last year we spent $5,000,000 for agricultural experiment stations; $1,400,000 for the rehabilitation of forest lands; over half a million for the control of diseases of plants and animals, and in addition we appropriate $79,000,000 for highways. It would certainly seem logical for us to appropriate $1,000,000 a year for the rehabilitation of children.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment to come in on page 100. I ask the Secretary to read it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 100, line 25, it is proposed to strike out the word "and"; on page 101, line 3, before the period, to insert a semicolon and the following: "And (3) to Indians residing on Indian reservations whose names are carried on the tribal rolls, for the purpose of furnishing subsistence to said Indians, and such loans to be made on the security of wool produced on the reservation and blankets manufactured on the reservation from wool produced on the reservation"; and on page 101, line 5, to strike out the word "such" and to insert the words "Except as provided in clause (3) of this subdivision, such."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. In order that the discussion of the bill may proceed orderly, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate first consider committee amendments to the bill in their order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. NORRIS. What is the request?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request is that the amendments of the committee be first considered. The Chair will state, however, that there is only one committee amendment.

Mr. ASHURST. I have no objection to that course.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not understand the request.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The request is first to consider the committee amendments in their order.

Mr. BULKLEY. There is but one committee amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. There is only one committee amendment.

Mr. ASHURST. I propose an amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. BULKLEY. I object to the request.

Mr. ASHURST. I have no objection to the request of the Senator from Montana, but I wish to explain my amendment, and I will do so briefly if I may.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me inquire if the request of the Senator from Montana is pending, or was objection made?

Mr. ASHURST. It was objected to.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I withdraw the request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will again state, in order that there may be no confusion, that there is only one committee amendment, which will be considered as a bill.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, my amendment proposes to extend to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation the power and authority, in its discretion, to make loans to Indians on Indian reservations, whose names are carried on the tribal rolls, and to take as security for such loans wool produced by Indians on Indian reservations, or blankets woven by Indians out of wool produced by Indians on Indian reservations. In northeastern Arizona and northwestern New Mexico there dwell about 43,000 pure-blood Indians. They are and always have been self-supporting. They are a pastoral, and, in a small degree, an agricultural people. For scores of years, indeed, for centuries, these Indians have been flockmasters; they raise sheep and goats, they shear their sheep and goats and weave with their own Indian handicraft a part of the wool crop into beautiful and most useful blankets; indeed, the Navajo Indian blankets are known all over America, and I have seen one of them in Europe.

Owing to what we call the "depression" it has been of late almost impossible for these Indians further to find any market for their wool. By their own skill, patience, industry, and remarkable handicraft they have in the past produced large numbers of these blankets that would in ordinary times sell in the market at from ten to eighty dollars each. There is no market to be found under present conditions; ultimately the market will return, but the Indian must receive credit in the meantime. Hence, my amendment provides that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, on these securities, viz, Indian wool and blankets, may, if it sees fit, make loans to these Indians to stabilize their goat and sheep raising business.

These Indians are asking no charity, no gift, no bounty, no gratuity. These Indians are upstanding, self-supporting citizens who have felt this depression as keenly as has any other citizen.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I should like to modify the unanimous-consent request that I proposed a short while ago to this effect—that the bill be considered section by section, in their order, so that when we reach the point at which the Senator from Arizona thinks his amendment is appropriate it may be offered at that time.

Mr. ASHURST. I could not now consent to that. In good faith I obtained the floor. Amendments are in order. I want to oblige my well-beloved seat.mate. It is a privilege, and a distinction as well, to sit near him; but I can not at this time consent that this amendment which I have offered be postponed. I think we shall make progress by treating this bill in the usual way, so that Senators at any time may offer any amendment they see fit. Certainly I do not want to be put into the position of making my argument and then having the matter postponed until some indefinite date.

If the Senator from Montana can point out any good that will come from adopting the committee amendment first,

I shall consider it; but there is only one amendment, and that is a committee amendment. I do not perceive, parliamentarily, how we may proceed otherwise than to go ahead and to allow amendments to the committee amendment.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. ASHURST. If I have the floor, I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. I think the Senator from Arizona is correct. This measure came from the committee as one bill, comprising amendments to the so-called Garner bill. There are no committee amendments outside of the bill as a whole; and it, therefore, seems to me in proper order to take up any amendment at any time.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I am not to be understood as objecting on parliamentary grounds to the consideration of the amendment now offered by the Senator from Arizona. If he insists upon consideration of his amendment, of course he is entitled to have it considered and disposed of. I merely suggested that in the interest of orderly procedure we ought not to be jumping from one part of the bill to another part of the bill and back again, here and there, so that we will never know where we stand on the matter.

My idea was that we should take up section 1, for instance, and any amendments appropriate to what is set forth in section 1 might then be considered; and then, when we dispose of that, we might take up section 2, and so on through the bill. Of course no Senator would be precluded from offering any amendments that he saw fit to offer at any time; but the sole purpose of my request for unanimous consent is that each section might be taken up in order and perfected.

Mr. COUZENS. I indorse the position of the Senator from Montana; I did not hear him make the statement previously. It does seem to me that we will never know what section is being considered if we do not proceed along the lines he has suggested.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly; and I trust, therefore, the Senator from Arizona will defer offering his amendment, and take that course.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. If I have the floor, I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. The bill proper begins in line 14, page 100, does it not?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly.

Mr. ASHURST. That is the very place where I propose my amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is in that very paragraph that the Senator presents his amendment—the first paragraph of the bill. In the second line I have two very brief amendments, which I assume will neither take time nor be objected to; but the Senator from Arizona was first on his feet, and his amendment deals with the very first section of the bill.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly. In that situation, it seems to me that the Senator from Arizona should cheerfully acquiesce in the suggestion I make.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, the amendment the Senator from Arizona proposes deals with section 1, and if we consent to the proposal made by the Senator from Montana it will not interfere with his offering his amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. If I have the floor, I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator from Arizona acquiesces in the suggestion made by the Senator from Montana, it seems to me that after we have passed one part of the bill and are taking up some part farther on it will be out of order to go back and offer an amendment to a prior part of the bill.

Moreover, as I understand the parliamentary situation, the House text is subject to amendment before we vote on the committee amendment; and instead of commencing over on page 100, if we followed that suggestion we would commence on page 1, Title I, Relief of Destitution, which is the House text, all of which is subject to amendment.

We have always considered bills just as the Senator from Arizona is considering this one. We have not taken them up in order. If we take the position that these Senators want the Senator from Arizona to take, we will then be precluded logically, when we have acted on an amendment, from going back to any part of the bill prior to the place where that amendment comes in.

It seems to me we are going on in the regular way, and the way in which the Senate always considers these amendments.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I was endeavoring to proceed in accordance with the well-established practice of the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. We have no rule here that I know of that prevents any Senator from offering an amendment to any part of a bill at any time.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. However, if there is the slightest objection to what I have proposed, I do not care to press it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I usually yield gracefully, but this morning I am going to yield without grace.

I said before that it is a privilege and a liberal education as well to sit by the side of the Senator from Montana. Those who do not have that privilege are denied instruction in the classics and in law. I can not say the same for him regarding parliamentary law. In the field of municipal law, and international and constitutional law, and the rule of evidence I bow profoundly and humbly at the shrine of his intellect; but I believe he is in error in this instance with regard to procedure. I never was more convinced of anything than that I am parliamentarily correct, ethically correct, and mechanically correct so far as saving the time of the Senate is concerned, in commencing just where the first line of the Senate bill commences.

If, however, any Senator wishes me to defer offering the amendment, of course I shall do so; and so accustomed am I to being under the influence of the senior Senator from Montana that I shall withdraw the amendment at this time, although for once in my life I surrender when I think I am right.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. I was going to ask the Senator what amendment the Senator from Montana proposes to take up ahead of his, then.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have no desire to take up any amendment ahead of the amendment of the Senator from Arizona. My proposal was that the Senate proceed to consider section 1 of the amendment offered by the committee, as suggested by the Senator, on page 100, and then pass on. I do not mean to preclude any Senator from coming back at any later time to offer an amendment to page 100. I simply suggested that we proceed in that order.

Mr. COUZENS. But just what amendment would be pending under the Senator's proposal? There would be no amendment pending.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If unanimous consent were given, then the Senator from Arizona, who, I understand, desires to amend section 1, could tender his amendment, and it would come up for consideration.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further? I think we had better go ahead under the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arizona, because I understand that there is an administration committee working somewhere to propose an amendment to loan money to private corporations. Just what section of this bill that would apply to, I am not informed; so I think we had better proceed with the amendment of the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. Of course, if the Senator is right and that proposal is to be made and it succeeds, it will cover the proposal made by the Senator from Arizona, the amendment he has offered here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will please be in order, so that the Chair can state the proposition.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I desire to surrender the floor, and I call for a ruling from the present Presiding Officer, Mr. FESS. He has for some years presided over a very numerous and tumultuous body of men, very respectable in character; and with his rich and ripe knowledge of parliamentary law, I shall yield to his opinion.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I desire to propound a parliamentary inquiry, and let the Chair rule on it when he rules on the other matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CONNALLY. My inquiry is as to whether, the original House bill being before us, amendments to that text are not in order. They would be preferential amendments to the committee amendment, would they not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The entire bill is open to amendment.

Mr. CONNALLY. I mean the original House text of the bill. An amendment to perfect the House text would be in order, would it not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct. It would take precedence.

The Chair desired to state to the Senate, so that there might be no confusion, that the Senate amendment is treated as one amendment. The House text is open to amendment. If any Senator offers an amendment to any part of the House text, that will have to be considered first, because it is a strike-out-and-insert proposal.

Mr. JOHNSON and Mr. NORRIS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will please suspend. If the Senate considers the Senate committee amendment as one, as it would have to, it can, if desired, be considered section by section, as the Senator from Montana has suggested; but the result of that would be that the Chair would order the reading of the first section, then if there should be an amendment to it, it would be disposed of, and we would pass from that section and could not return to it without unanimous consent. Otherwise Senators can offer amendments to any section of the Senate bill.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I think we ought to begin at the beginning of the bill, because I think we ought to reject the committee amendment on lines 3 and 4, page 1, where the committee struck out the language:

That this act may be cited as the "national emergency relief act of 1932."

My view is that that committee amendment ought to be rejected. Then the bill will start out in the manner in which the bill stood as it passed the House. In other words, it would be named what it really is, the "national emergency relief act of 1932." If Senators look on page 100 they will find that there is no title to the bill except as it appears above the enacting clause on page 1 of the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan appears to have the idea that this amendment can be divided up. He says the first amendment of the committee is in line 3. As a matter of fact, it is an impossibility, it seems to me, to divide up the committee amendment. There is but one committee amendment, and while the particular language referred to by the Senator from Michigan is part of that amendment, it is no more a part of it than the lines on page 29, or page 30, or page 50, or page 10. It is all one amendment. There is but one amendment.

Under the rules of the Senate, this being a substitute amendment proposed by the committee, before we vote on that substitute amendment as a whole, which we eventually must do, both the part proposed to be stricken out and the part proposed to be inserted are subject to amendment. So that at the present time it is in order, under our rules, as I understand the parliamentary situation, to offer an amendment to any part of the bill, from page 1 to the last clause in the bill, on page 114. As between a proposed amendment to change the House text and a proposed amendment to the committee text, the proposal to change the House text takes precedence.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. I would like to ask the Senator how I would proceed, then, to have retained in the bill the language in lines 3 and 4, page 1.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it is already in the bill.

Mr. COUZENS. Just a moment.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator wants to keep it in, instead of having it stricken out?

Mr. COUZENS. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. He may offer that language, if he wants to, as a preface to the committee amendment, as an amendment to the committee amendment, so that, if the Senator is successful, if the committee amendment is agreed to, he will have his amendment in the measure. When we finally come to vote on substituting the committee amendment, if that is defeated, then the language referred to by the Senator will remain in the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the Senator will turn to page 114 of the bill, he will find that that exact language is found in lines 7 and 8. It is transferred from page 1 of the bill to page 114 of the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. I will say to the Senator from Michigan that his language is going to stay in unless it is changed, because it is in the House text and in the Senate committee amendment.

Mr. COUZENS. I stand corrected.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from New York some questions about this bill, and I apologize for doing so, because I intended to listen to his explanation of the bill, but I was called out under such circumstances that I could not decline, and when I returned to the Chamber, the Senator had completed his explanation.

What expenditure of money, in toto, referring to the Senate committee amendment, is provided for?

Mr. WAGNER. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized to issue its debentures so as to extend credit of $1,460,000,000 for self-liquidating projects. Of course, they are of different types, and I shall not attempt to define them in detail.

Mr. NORRIS. In addition to that, as I understand it, $120,000,000 is provided for the building of public highways.

Mr. WAGNER. May I finish as to the self-liquidating projects?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. WAGNER. It is proposed that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation be authorized to advance $40,000,000 to the Secretary of Agriculture for the purpose of financing the export of agricultural commodities. Then $500,000,000 is provided for Federal public construction, which is to be for buildings, for highways——

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. WAGNER. Yes; $132,000,000 for highways, $100,000,000 for public buildings, and the rest to be distributed for river and harbor improvements, flood control, lighthouse construction, and so on.

Mr. NORRIS. How much for flood control?

Mr. WAGNER. There is an additional $30,000,000, I think it is.

Mr. NORRIS. That is in addition to what has already been provided?

Mr. WAGNER. It is just one-half as much again as is provided in the regular appropriation bills.

May I say to the Senator that that sum was decided upon by the committee after consulting with the head of the department who has charge of this construction work. We inquired of him how much more money he could use this year, how much more he could utilize this year in putting men to work within the year, that we were not concerned with some time in the future. He told us that $30,000,000 was all he could utilize this year in employing additional men.

Mr. NORRIS. Am I correct in my understanding that only $120,000,000 is provided for the building of public highways?

Mr. WAGNER. For highways, $132,000,000 altogether.

Mr. NORRIS. That is to cover the entire United States?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me remark that that feature of the bill is a repetition of what is known as the Almon bill, which passed the House and is now upon the Senate Calendar.

Mr. NORRIS. The point I wanted to bring out was that it appears that there is $1,460,000,000 for the so-called self-liquidating projects, which means tunnels and projects of that kind, I understand.

Mr. WAGNER. And waterworks.

Mr. NORRIS. Waterworks? What kind of waterworks?

Mr. WAGNER. Water supplies for communities; and even a municipal electric plant, not being self-liquidating alone, could be erected under this measure.

Mr. NORRIS. The great bulk of that would be expended, would it not, in New York City?

Mr. WAGNER. I beg the Senator's pardon. Only a very small portion of it would be spent there.

Mr. NORRIS. How much?

Mr. WAGNER. There are only two projects in New York for which this provision would be available. One is a joint project in which New York and New Jersey are jointly interested, the Forty-eighth Street tunnel, and the other is the Triborough Bridge in New York. Those are the only two I know of in the whole State of New York.

Mr. NORRIS. What will they cost?

Mr. WAGNER. I am sorry I can not tell the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. How many men will they give employment to? Can the Senator give us any information about that?

Mr. WAGNER. I can not tell; but quite a number. As a matter of fact, so far as the so-called Forty-eighth Street tunnel is concerned, unless that work is proceeded with, the port authorities in New York will have to dismiss a great portion of their engineering force.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not want the Senator to get the idea that I am criticizing these works.

Mr. WAGNER. I think it is an unfair impression to create that New York is particularly interested in these self-liquidating projects.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection if New York is, but I want to get the facts. I am inquiring for information.

Mr. WAGNER. I think the Senator from California can tell the Senator of some projects in California.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no doubt about it. The Senator must not get the idea that I am asking my questions for the purpose of criticizing the various projects. It may be that I will feel like criticizing some of them when I get the information.

Mr. WAGNER. What I was afraid of was that those outside might get the impression that this was particularly meant for New York.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to consider this bill, and it seems to me that we all ought to have this measure in mind as an unemployment proposition. I want to, if I can, get as much good as possible for the people of the various communities, or the country at large, from this unemployment measure, that is true. I want to secure the employment of the unemployed where their work will redound to the benefit of the people. But, in the main, as I understand it, we are trying to pass something which will furnish jobs to the unemployed.

Mr. WAGNER. That is exactly it. That is the sole object of the legislation.

Mr. NORRIS. If such a thing were possible, having all the unemployed put to work in one State would not make any difference to me, if that could be done properly, but I think it is perfectly evident that the best way to take care of the unemployment is to provide jobs, as nearly as we can, all over the country, so as not to rush the unemployed to one community, or one locality. We should try to keep the employment distributed, if we can.

It seemed to me that one of the things that would give employment to the unemployed more than any other one thing would be the building of highways. I am not married to that idea, by any means. If there is any other plan that will result in giving more employment for the money expended, regardless of where it would be carried out, I would be for it, but I am struck with this idea, that the great bulk of the money provided for in this measure apparently will go to a very few localities.

I am not objecting. I do not want the Senator from New York to get the idea that I am objecting to that. If those particular things will result in the employment of the unemployed, I am in favor of them, regardless of where they are located. I would like to have jobs given to as many people as possible for the amount of money expended. But it does seem to me that the amount of money allocated to the particular so-called self-liquidating projects is much larger than could be very meritoriously allocated to the building of public highways all over the United States, for instance. I am not objecting that this is too much, except in proportion to the amount the bill seems to set aside for the building of highways. Rather than decrease this amount for the so-called self-liquidating projects, I believe we ought to increase the amount for other projects covered by the bill, particularly for the building of highways. It would make a bigger job of legislation, and if I have any criticism, with the limited knowledge I have of the bill, it is that it is not big enough, is not broad enough, does not take a national view, it seems to me, of the great unemployment situation, and will not give employment to enough people to have the right kind of effect, the effect I think our bill ought to have. It seems to me, much as we may regret it, we will have to increase the size of the bill very greatly.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. May I say this to the Senator, that I have in my office, and unfortunately it is not here, a list of projects of this self-liquidating character, and I think when the Senator examines it he will be surprised to see how well distributed the projects are throughout the country.

Mr. NORRIS. I shall be very much delighted to learn that.

Mr. WAGNER. I do not know how much the Senator's own State would benefit, but generally it is pretty well distributed in municipalities and public corporations created by different States undertaking particular kinds of projects which employ great numbers.

As to the percentage of dollars that would go to the worker, I have here a statement of the percentage, collected by the Society of Civil Engineers, so this is from an authoritative source. It says that in concrete road construction 77 per cent of the cost goes to wages. In general road construction, 76 per cent goes to wages. In general construction, 80 per cent goes to wages.

Mr. NORRIS. What does general construction mean?

Mr. WAGNER. That would mean buildings, other things than roads. Then, water works, 91 per cent.

I have a list of some communities which have undertaken to supply water to their residents instead of having private companies do it. They have had to abandon the projects for the time being, because they were unable to sell the bonds. If we can help such communities we serve a health purpose, and we serve an employment purpose, because 91 per cent of the benefits of that sort of construction go directly to the workers.

The Senator sees the disproportion between the amount provided for Federal construction and that provided for self-liquidating projects. It does not have in mind highways, because those are planned by the States. Outside of that the difficulty is that we can not get any more Federal projects which we can justify as reasonably necessary because they have not been planned sufficiently in advance so we can now put men to work. As a matter of fact, Congress enacted a law which became effective in February, 1931, under which the Government was directed to prepare in advance its public-construction program so that in case an industrial slack came in private industry we could accelerate public construction so as to help take up the slack. If that law had been obeyed we would have been in a much better position now to accelerate public construction. I am sure my colleagues who worked with me in the preparation of this bill will agree that we were unable to find any other public construction where we could say in truth that the undertaking would put men to work at once. I am speaking of Federal work.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me say a few words in reply to the Senator from New York, who has been endeavoring to answer my question. He has been talking about public works other than public roads. The particular thing about which I was inquiring, or at least that I had in mind, was to call attention to the fact that the bill provides for a very small amount of money to be expended for the building of public roads as compared to the so-called self-liquidating projects that are provided for in the bill. The remarks which the Senator has made about the lack of preparation and lack of information which the committee found in regard to these other things I do not think apply, and I do not think the Senator wants them to apply to the public-roads question.

We have the machinery already in operation for the construction of public roads. It would have to be enlarged somewhat, but the nucleus of the machinery is all there. I remember that figures were given early in this session, showing the percentage of labor that goes into the various kinds of public improvements. As I remember the statistics which were given to the Senate at that time, public roads had the largest percentage of labor involved of all public improvements. The figures which the Senator has presented are somewhat different. Of course, I can see how a so-called expert working out the figures could take the viewpoint that would cut them down. For instance, in the matter of public roads it is not only the men who are working on the roads themselves, but it involves the men in the factory who are building the machines which are necessary and the men in the factories who are making the cement. It involves also the transportation facilities which have to carry the machinery and the materials all over the country and which employ a number of men, all of which involves a great deal of labor. What I was trying to do was to lay the foundation, if possible, for an enlargement of the program somewhere. It seems to me the most inviting field for the enlargement is in the matter of public roads.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I share the view expressed by the Senator from Nebraska that probably the only form of public works which we can authorize which will give employment to labor in all sections of the country is road work. I advanced that view earlier in the session when we had the La Follette-Costigan bill under consideration and endeavored to secure liberal appropriations for work of that character.

With respect to the disparity, however, in this bill between the amounts appropriated for public roads and the amounts for self-liquidating projects, I must invite the attention of the Senator from Nebraska and of the Senate generally to the fact that the appropriations for self-liquidating projects are supposed eventually to return to the Treasury every dollar that is taken out of it. Those are loans which are to be made for projects, and the loans are to be repaid, so that it is expected eventually—at least the theory of the thing is that eventually—the Treasury will not be out a dollar.

So far as the road program is concerned, that is money out of the Treasury which never comes back. We simply provide to advance now the funds for roads, the appropriations to be made immediately instead of from time to time in the future. So there is that distinction which will justify as a matter of course a very much larger figure for self-liquidating projects than for roads.

I might say with respect to the road proposition that I have a letter from a very thoughtful and highly intelligent constituent, who writes:

> I do not wish to bother you too much, but it seems to me that the only way Montana can derive any good from relief or construction legislation is through the appropriation of emergency money for highways. I very much doubt if Montana will borrow any money for any other purpose. Road money can be immediately transformed into assistance for unemployment. It is the only method where money can be put into production and not flood the market. It, of course, should be distributed under the Federal highway act, which is a proven statute.

That shows the views taken in my State, in which I share, with respect to the roads. In the preparation of the bill which has now become the committee amendment—the bill introduced by the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] some time ago and drafted by a group of us—we just adopted the bill which came over from the House providing for relief work in the way of highway construction. We have made no change in it whatever. That bill was pending here and we simply took it and incorporated it in the bill now pending. That bill has already passed the House and it signifies what the House is willing to do in the way of road construction.

I should not object at all to expanding that. Indeed, I proposed $375,000,000 for road construction in connection with the La Follette-Costigan bill and my recollection is the Senator from Nebraska offered such an amendment which was incorporated in the bill. We are seeking to have a bill passed that has some chance of approval by the other House and by the Executive. Under these circumstances I do not feel like enlarging the amount of the appropriation carried in the Almon bill and made a part of this bill.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator for his suggestion. I do not want to get away and I hope the Senate will not get away from the fact that the real thing we are trying to accomplish is to provide jobs for the unemployed. That is the first and primary purpose. If we do not do that, it means that the unemployed will have to be supported from charity. If local authorities can not provide the means—and they have about exhausted all their resources in that respect—then the Federal Government must do it. I think that is a proposition to which everybody will agree. If we do it in the way of charity we get no return, we get nothing back for the expenditure of our money. If there is no other way to do it, of course I would be in favor of doing it that way.

Of course, the unemployed must be fed and must be taken care of. If while we are taking care of them we can get something back for the country, then so much the better for the country and so much the better for the unemployed. It is going to be humiliating in the extreme for millions of the unemployed to accept charity. They want work, they want jobs, and so we ought to provide jobs for them. Even if we do not get back 100 per cent of our investment, we ought to provide jobs. Even though the works provided are not perhaps needed at the present time, nevertheless the main object is to provide work for the unemployed.

Incidentally while we are providing it we want to get as much good out of the work they do as possible and save them from the humiliation of becoming subjects of charity. Therefore it seems to me that we ought to present a bigger program than that for which the bill makes provision. It is all right to follow the House in something they have already passed and it is all right to favor the President and get something that he will sign. However, those are all incidents. They are only incidental. What we ought to do is to provide a program that will do the work.

We have a bigger job on our hands than we realize, I believe. The expenditure or the authorization of the expenditure of the amount of money provided in the bill will not, in my judgment, do the job. We ought to present now a program that is broad enough and big enough so that the ordinary business man and every other man who is hesitating in some business enterprise will realize that here is something that is going to accomplish the purpose and do the job and get rid of unemployment. He will start up in his business, he will start up in his operations, and it will all help. But if we stop with a program that everybody can see in advance is not going to accomplish the desired end, it will not be any inducement for anybody to start up in his business operations.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I wish to say, in response to the suggestion made by the Senator from Nebraska concerning a broad program, that I have introduced amendments, which are now lying on the table, to provide for a five and a half billion dollar program, and it may interest the Senator—and I hope he will give the amendments consideration—that in connection with that program there is provision made for highway construction and reconstruction and grade-crossing elimination up to an amount not to exceed $1,000,000,000.

Mr. NORRIS. I am glad to hear the Senator say that. I had in mind the preparation of an amendment along that line, but I will be relieved of that work and will be glad to follow the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WAGNER. I was going to say to the Senator that I think that he will agree that the projects which have been provided for, including highways, are the type of undertakings which will give the highest percentage of employment.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to invite the attention of the Senator again to the fact that the questions I have asked have been asked in no critical sense whatever.

Mr. WAGNER. I understand that.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to help, but I also wanted to call attention to what I believe to be the infirmities of the proposition now before us.

Mr. WAGNER. That is as to highways.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; and as to any other proposition. I am not wedded to highways. If anybody can suggest any other method that will afford more jobs, I will follow it; and if the jobs all go into one State, I will follow it; but I should like to have them distributed. I think, everything else being equal, the work should be distributed over the country, because I think if we would give a broader scope along geographical lines in the matter of providing employment the better the results would be. I would not want employment oportunity concentrated in one section, unless that is necessary, although I concede that is better than nothing.

Mr. WAGNER. Perhaps it is a reiteration, but, may I say to the Senator again, an examination of the list of available self-liquidating projects will, I think, persuade him that those projects are pretty well distributed throughout the country. Of course, we know that the worker at the site of a particular construction undertaking is not the only worker who is benefited, but the construction of projects benefits workers in the mines and the factories, and finally agriculture indirectly will have an advantage because of the increased consumption of food.

As to the highway-construction program I will not quarrel with the Senator, because if he will examine a bill that is now on the calendar, reported by the Committee on Manufactures some months ago, providing for direct relief and also for employment, he will see that it contains a provision for $375,000,000 for highway construction. However, I have a practical question in mind; I really want to see legislation enacted. Even though it may not go to the limit to which I would like to see it go, and though it may not be quite as adequate as I should like to see it, I am praying for a start somewhere, and I do not want to be in a position of advocating legislation which I am told ahead of time will not be approved.

Mr. NORRIS. That has something to do with it; I understand that; and I realize that the President of the United States at the beginning was opposed to everything of this kind. He did not want the Federal Government to do anything; he wanted the local charitable organizations to take care of all these problems. I suppose he is convinced by this time that that is an impossibility; in other words, that the will-'o-the-wisp known as prosperity is a good deal farther away than he thought it was. We have been around all the corners that he led us and we have not found it. He is convinced, undoubtedly, by this time that he must enlarge his program somewhat. We ought to pass a bill that will do the work and let him take the responsibility whether he will veto it or not; and if he vetoes it, we ought to pass it over his veto. People are learning every day; the President is a human being and will learn, too, and probably has learned by this time, that his method of meeting the unemployment situation as he started in is entirely inadequate; that it will not accomplish the purpose; and so he will broaden out his ideas. I do not know any reason why we should be afraid to do what we think is right on the theory that he is going to veto it.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATFIELD in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. GLENN. If the Senator from Nebraska will permit me, I should like to make a few brief observations about the highway situation.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator would just as lief, I am about through, and when I conclude the Senator can then take the floor in his own right.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. Has the Senator, outside of the suggestion of an increased appropriation for highways, any other suggestion to make as to what other Federal public works may be added to this program as to which we may have some assurance that men will be employed at once or within a reasonable time?

Mr. NORRIS. I have not anything else in mind. As I look at it, highway construction is one of the great avenues in which the Federal Government can do good of a lasting kind to the people and give employment to more men for the money expended, I think, than in any other way. It has the additional advantage that it spreads all over the United States. I do not believe, Mr. President, that the depression is going to disappear in the next few months or within the next year. Perhaps it will; we would be delighted if it should; but we ought to fight it like we fought the war.

When we got through with the war we had many things on our hands because we did not know when the war was going to end and we could not take a chance by assuming it was going to end to-morrow and when to-morrow should come if the war did not end find ourselves unprepared to carry it on. And so it is with this fight. We ought to be prepared by providing several years of work. That will have a psychological effect, and that ought to appeal to the President of the United States, who is a great student of psychology, although he probably has lost some of his interest in it because of the failure during the last year or so of a good many of his promises to come true. If we are prepared to meet this emergency by a program that is large enough to meet it, that very fact itself will have a wonderful psychological effect upon the temperament of the people and upon the entire business activities of the United States.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE subsequently said: Mr. President, in view of the fact that some discussion was had of the amendment I intend to propose during the time when the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] was addressing the Senate, I ask unanimous consent that that amendment may be printed at the conclusion of his remarks for the information of those Senators who may desire to study it over the week-end.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. LA FOLLETTE to the bill (H. R. 12445) to relieve destitution, to broaden the lending powers of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and to create employment by authorizing and expediting a public-works program and providing a method of financing such program, viz: On page 100, strike out lines 14 through 25; on page 101, strike out lines 1 through 17; on page 102, strike out all after line 7; strike out all of pages 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 108; on page 109, strike out lines 1 through 5; and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"That it is hereby declared to be the policy of the Congress to provide for the more effective conduct and administration of Federal public-works activities; that, during the period of emergency hereby recognized to exist, public-works expenditures should be largely expanded in order to stimulate production and business activity and to alleviate unemployment; and that in pursuance of this policy it is the desire of Congress that the expenditure of the emergency funds made available by this act shall be governed, in the discretion of the Administrator of Public Works, provided for in section 2, by the following considerations:

"(1) Facility with which projects may be gotten under way at the earliest possible date.

"(2) Amount of labor that will be employed, directly or indirectly.

"(3) Number and diversity of the industries which will be affected, directly or indirectly, by said projects.

"(4) Value of the projects to the economic and social welfare of the country.

"(5) Economical administration of the work.

"ADMINISTRATION OF PUBLIC WORKS

"SEC. 2. (a) There is hereby established at the seat of government and Administration of Public Works, under the direction of the Administrator of Public Works. The Administrator of Public works shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. He shall receive a salary at the rate of $15,000 per annum, and his term and tenure of office shall be like that of the heads of the executive departments.

"(b) The administrator—

"(1) Shall maintain the principal office of the Administration of Public Works in the District of Columbia, and such other offices in the United States as in his judgment are necessary.

"(2) Shall cause a seal of office to be made for the Administration of Public Works, of such device as the President shall approve, and judicial notice shall be taken thereof.

"(3) Shall make such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

"(4) Shall make annually, at the close of each fiscal year, a report in writing to Congress, giving an account of all moneys received and disbursed by him and the Administration of Public Works, describing the work done by the Administration of Public Works, and making such recommendations as he shall deem necessary. He shall also make from time to time such special investigations and reports as may be required by him by the President or either House of Congress, or as he himself may deem necessary and urgent.

"(5) May appoint and fix the compensation of such assistant administrators and technical and scientific experts, and, subject to the provisions of the civil service laws, may appoint, and, in accordance with the classification act of 1923, as amended, fix the compensation of such other officers and employees as are necessary to execute the functions vested by this act in the Administrator or the Administration of Public Works.

"(6) May make such expenditures (including expenditures for personal services and rent at the seat of government and elsewhere, for law books, periodicals, and books of reference, and for printing and binding) as is necessary to execute the functions vested in the administrator or in the Administration of Public Works. Such expenditures shall be allowed and paid upon the presentation of itemized vouchers therefor approved by the administrator.

"EMERGENCY-CONSTRUCTION PROGRAM

"SEC. 3. To meet the emergency hereby recognized to exist, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $5,500,000,000, to be immediately available for expenditure by the Administrator of Public Works in the manner hereinafter provided.

"SEC. 4. In carrying out the emergency-construction program, the administrator—

"(1) May appoint advisory boards and committees to advise and confer with him. No salary shall be paid to board or committee members, but when attending meetings or engaged in other activities at the request of the administrator they shall be allowed necessary traveling and subsistence expenses, or per diem allowance in lieu thereof, within the limitations prescribed by law for civilian employees in the executive branch of the Government.

"(2) May hold hearings and require, by subpœna, the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of books, papers, and documents and may administer oaths. In case of disobedience to any subpœna the administrator may invoke the aid of any court of the United States in requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of books, papers, and documents.

"(3) Shall submit monthly to the President and to the Senate and House of Representatives (or the Secretary of the Senate or the Clerk of the House of Representatives, if those bodies are not in session) a full and detailed report of the emergency activities and expenditures of the Administration of Public Works, together with a statement showing the condition of the funds administered by him. Such reports shall, when submitted, be printed as public documents.

"SEC. 5. That administrator is authorized to deduct from any appropriation made pursuant to the authorization contained in this act so much thereof as he deems necessary for the expenses of the Administration of Public Works in carrying out the emergency provisions of this act The remainder of any such appropriations shall be available for expenditure for the purpose hereinafter set forth, upon allocation by the administrator in accordance with and in furtherance of the policy set forth in section 1 of this act, so far as the administrator deems feasible.

"SEC. 6. In addition to the regular appropriations for the public works hereinafter specified the administrator may expend for such public works a total of not to exceed $650,000,000 of the amount authorized in section 3 as follows:

"(1) For the preservation and maintenance of existing river and harbor works and for the prosecution of such projects heretofore and hereafter authorized as may be most desirable in the interest of commerce and navigation, and for the prosecution of flood-control projects heretofore or hereafter authorized, not to exceed $200,000,000;

"(2) For carrying into effect the provisions of the public buildings act, approved May 25, 1926, as now or hereafter amended and supplemented, in respect of public buildings within and without the District of Columbia, not to exceed $275,000,000;

"(3) For the construction and reconstruction of forest roads and trails, not to exceed $50,000,000;

"(4) For the prosecution of irrigation, drainage, and reclamation projects heretofore or hereafter approved in accordance with law, not to exceed $25,000,000;

"(5) For repair and remodeling of existing buildings and structures, and for miscellaneous Federal public works, in the discretion of the President, not to exceed $100,000,000.

"SEC. 7. In addition to the regular appropriations for Federal-aid highways, the administrator may allocate an additional $1,000,000,000 of the amount authorized in section 3 for the construction and reconstruction of highways in the manner hereinafter provided, which shall be available for expenditure upon highway projects approved by the administrator, as follows:

"(a) Not to exceed $500,000,000 of such amount shall from time to time be apportioned by the administrator among the several States in the manner provided by section 21 of the Federal highway act, as amended and supplemented, and shall be available for expenditure in the same manner, so far as practicable, as other funds appropriated for carrying out the provisions of the Federal highway act, with the following exceptions:

"(1) The limitation of payments permitted by said act shall be increased to $50,000 per mile, exclusive of the cost of bridges of more than 20 feet clear span;

"(2) Any amounts apportioned to any State not claimed by such State shall be available for payment to States who are able to proceed with construction over and above their apportionment;

"(3) Such funds may be used as a temporary advance to meet the requirements of such act as to State funds, to be reimbursed to the Federal Government over a period of five years, commencing with the fiscal year beginning next after the termination of the emergency, by making deductions from regular apportionments made from future authorizations for carrying out the provisions of such act.

"(b) Not to exceed $150,000,000 of such amount shall be available for meeting 50 per cent of the cost to the several States and their civil subdivisions of highway bridge construction, without regard to the provisions of the Federal highway act limiting the expenditures of Federal funds to bridges outside certain municipalities.

"(d) Not to exceed $100,000,000 of such amount shall be available for meeting 50 per cent of the cost to the several States and their civil subdivisions of elimination of highway grade crossings and construction of by-pass roads.

"SEC. 8. (a) The administrator may allocate not to exceed $3,750,000,000 of the amount authorized in section 3 for the purpose of making loans to States and their civil subdivisions for (1) construction of Federal-aid highways; (2) construction of other State, county, and municipal highways, streets, and pavements; (3) construction of bridges; (4) construction of water-supply and sewerage works; (5) construction of flying fields, exclusive of purchase of lands; (6) establishing of parks and playgrounds, exclusive of purchase of lands; (7) construction of public buildings; (8) elimination of grade crossings; (9) reforestation and fire prevention, exclusive of purchase of lands; and (10) other construction of a public or semipublic character.

"(b) Loans made under the provisions of this section shall be for periods of not more than 10 years, at a rate of interest three-fourths of 1 per cent above the average rate at the time of making the loan for the bonds issued theretofore under the provisions of this act, but in no event to exceed 5 per cent. No loans shall be made under the provisions of this section except upon the approval of the finance board created by section 10.

"SEC. 9. The administrator may allocate not to exceed $100,000,000 of the amount authorized in section 3 for the purpose of making loans to limited-dividend corporations created solely for the erection of housing, on projects for housing families of low-income levels, such projects to have the approval of the administrator with respect to (1) the financial structure and the limitation of the dividends of the corporation, and/or (2) the limitation of the rentals to be charged, and/or (3) the location and plan of the project with respect to city plans, slum clearance, and the rehabilitation of blighted areas in cities, and/or (4) the replacement of housing now unfit for healthful habitation, and/or (5) the guaranties under State or municipal laws and administration of adequate control, and/or (6) the senior or other financing of the project, and (7) such other considerations and safeguards as the administrator shall deem necessary or expedient. Such loans shall be made upon the same terms and conditions as loans made under section 8, except that such loans may be for periods of not more than 30 years, and may be amortized serially within such limitation of time.

"SEC. 10. There is hereby created an emergency finance board, to be composed of three members, appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. One of the members of the board shall be experienced in State and municipal finance, one shall be experienced in housing construction, and one shall be experienced in banking and finance generally. All applications for loans under sections 8 and 9 shall, subsequent to their approval by the administrator, be referred to the board for its approval. In acting upon such applications for loans the board shall take into consideration (1) the financial condition of the borrower and (2) the ability of the borrower to obtain funds at reasonable rates from other sources. No salary shall be paid to board members, but they shall be paid from funds available for the administration of this act a per diem compensation not to exceed $20 for time devoted to the business of the board, and necessary traveling and subsistence expenses or per diem allowance in lieu thereof, within the limitations prescribed by law for civilian employees in the executive branch of the Government. The members of the board shall serve during the continuation of the emergency.

"SEC. 11. Appropriations authorized by section 3 shall remain available until expended or until the index of industrial production, as now computed, of the Federal Reserve Board reaches index No. 95. Thereafter the administrator shall make no new commitments, and shall have the emergency powers conferred upon him by this act only so far as may be necessary to complete contracts already under way and liquidate the emergency affairs of the Administration of Public Works."

One page 109, line 13, strike out "$500,000,000," and in lieu thereof insert "$5,500,000,000."

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, although many of those who were objecting to my amendment have left the Chamber, in order to make some contribution to progress on the bill I am willing to withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Arizona is withdrawn.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. ASHURST. I am through and yield the floor.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, in the bill as passed by the House there are a considerable number of authorizations for necessary Army housing. I do not understand that the committee had any objection to these items, but it struck them out along with the remainder of the House provision. In order that the matter may be in conference I am going to offer substantially the same list of items as an amendment to this bill, and I understand the Senator from New York will make no objection.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator what is the total of the appropriation involved?

Mr. REED. The total is $15,335,000, the same as in the House bill. I send the amendment to the desk and ask for its adoption.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, this is simply the usual Army housing provision.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I am told that the preparations are so far advanced that work can begin almost immediately.

Mr. REED. In many cases that is true. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent, if the amendment shall be adopted, that the clerk be authorized to correct the total.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, may I have unanimous consent that the totals may be corrected?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I now offer an amendment to that part of the bill which has been stricken out so that the matter may be considered in conference. I ask the clerk to read the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 8, line 10, after the first set of numerals, it is proposed to insert:

Florence, post office, $90,000; Holbrook, post office, $90,000.

On page 8, line 13, to strike out the figures "$905,000" at the end of the line and to insert the figures "$1,085,000."

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, these two towns, respectively, are county seats of counties in Arizona, and the need for these buildings is real. This amendment is offered so that the matter may go to conference and may be considered.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I shall have to object to that particular amendment, because it is contrary to the policy adopted in connection with the bill introduced by me and my coauthors.

Mr. ASHURST. The amendment is to the House text.

Mr. WAGNER. I suggest that the Senator offer his amendment on Monday. I understand that we are going to finish for the day very soon, and in the meantime we may give his amendment a little further consideration, because we have avoided making any specific allocations in the bill.

Mr. ASHURST. I am sure the learned Senator is mistaken. There are scores of proposed buildings mentioned by name in the House text.

Mr. WAGNER. Yes; in the House text.

Mr. ASHURST. That is what I propose to amend. I am proposing to amend the House text so that the item may be in conference. If I could aid the learned and able Senator from New York, who with such skill and pertinacity has pursued this legislation, in facilitating its passage, I would do so.

I am availing myself of the privilege, which every Senator has, of attempting to perfect the part that is proposed to be stricken out. Every Senator has a right to propose amendments to the part proposed to be stricken out; and I am seeking to add two items under the Arizona list, for instance:

Arizona: Bisbee, post office, $135,000; Flagstaff, post office, $165,000; Jerome, post office, $90,000; Kingman, post office, $75,000; Mesa, post office, $90,000; Miami, post office, $110,000; Winslow, post office, $90,000; Nogales, immigration station, $150,000; in all, $905,000.

The House bill omitted to include an item for a post-office building at a county seat, to wit, the town of Florence, and also omitted to include an item of $90,000 for a post office at Holbrook, another county seat. I submit that Senators have the right to offer amendments to the part proposed to be stricken out, and I want a vote on my amendment.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. ASHURST. I do not yield for any motion to adjourn or to delay. I simply want a vote on my amendment.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I want to resist the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator has a right to vote against it.

Mr. WAGNER. I want to give this matter a little more consideration when there are more Senators present.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I now claim the floor, and say that the great vice of the United States Senate is that we pay attention to the wishes and requests of absentees. The Senate will not elevate itself in the esteem of the American people if, whenever a Senator rises and proposes any public matter, some other Senator says, "I want to have this matter considered when absentees may return."

If absentees prefer to play golf or to regale themselves at places of amusement rather than earn their salaries, mine is not the blame. Let the Senate be an example of diligence and prudence, and proceed with the business of the country. There are thousands of men in each State who would be willing to come here and work Saturday afternoons and consider it a great privilege to do so.

I have a right to a vote upon my amendment, and I ask for a vote. I shall take my chances now. I object to absentee control of the Senate. I object to the Senate adjourning to meet the wishes of dilettante statesmen who want to disport every afternoon on the golf links. Here is their place. Here is where they are sworn and paid to stay.

These remarks that I have just now made have been withheld too long. They say our Rome is burning. Aye, sir; it is burning, it is burning on the Capitoline Hills, and I do not propose to be a party to it.

Let the Senate proceed with diligence to earn its pay. Then we shall have a right to claim some small modicum of the esteem of the American people. I have been impatient all too long with these adjournments Saturday afternoon in order that statesmen may go upon the golf links or go to the ball games.

This is the time, this is the place, this is the hour to show statesmanship. I resent, as unworthy of the Senate, the suggestion that we ought to adjourn for Saturday afternoon. The people will adjourn us soon enough if they find out what is going on here.

Now I think the Senator from New York ought to let us have a vote on my amendment. If it is carried, I shall be glad of it. If I am beaten, I shall have no complaint to make; and I ask for a vote.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, before the Senator does that, let me suggest this——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The clerk will call the roll.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will not the Senator from New York withhold that suggestion?

Mr. WAGNER. I will withhold it.

Mr. FLETCHER. I was going to suggest that my friend from Arizona is letting his zealousness rather carry him beyond limits. For instance, the Senator makes a motion to amend the bill. He offers certain amendments. He has a right to do that, of course, and to discuss those amendments. The Chair was about to put the question as to whether or not the amendments should be agreed to when the Senator from New York rose. He had a right to do so. The Senator from Arizona can not hold the floor and prevent discussion of his amendments. He says, "I have the floor," and insists upon a vote. Of course the Senator from New York has a right to debate the matter.

Mr. ASHURST. Why, the Senator from New York certainly has that right; but what he said carried with it the suggestion that we vote on Monday.

Mr. FLETCHER. Of course, that is another matter.

Mr. ASHURST. That is the only matter I am talking about.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think the Senator from Arizona is correct in his position that the House bill is subject to amendment, and I do not see that it would do any harm to the bill to put in two additional post offices. I really do not believe any of those post offices will stay in this bill.

Mr. ASHURST. Well, if any stay in, my two will.

Mr. FLETCHER. I hope the Senator is right about that, but I do not think he can absolutely assert that as a positive fact.

In the first place, the House bill goes to conference along with the Senate bill, if we adopt the Senate bill as an amendment, and the whole matter will be in conference; and so the Senator has a right to add other building projects, if he can, to the House bill. So far as I am concerned, I think we might as well put them in. I do not think any of them are going to stay in.

Mr. ASHURST. They may not stay in. Possibly, if I were on the conference committee, I would be guided, as I usually am, by the wisdom and the statesmanship of the junior Senator from New York; but I said in the beginning, when I opened my remarks, that I simply wished these two items to be in conference, so that if and when the conferees agree to the House bill, these two places would be considered.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. Just a moment. I take back nothing. I neither apologize nor weaken nor retreat from my assertion that there is falling upon the Senate a flail of indignation; and that indignation is just when Senators disappear, dissolve, and leave their posts on Saturday afternoon.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. DILL. I want the Senator to yield that I may commend him for doing something that should have been done here months ago. It is the height of ridiculousness that the Senate must run away every Saturday afternoon.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I thank the Senator. I should dislike to be a private in an army that ran off every Saturday afternoon.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield the floor to the Senator.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I find myself much in sympathy with the able Senator from Arizona. If we are to amend the House text, I should support heartily his projects. I am just curious what answer he will give to this proposal:

I very much desire to have an executive session to take up two contested nominations, namely, the chairman of the Shipping Board and the member of the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I yield for any purpose as long as it does not contemplate an adjournment and a lackadaisical disregard of public duty. I yield for any purpose that proposes that the Senate shall go ahead and work.

Mr. McNARY. I was suggesting to the able Senator that his motion be pending on Monday. We can then go ahead with our executive session and clean up the calendar of contested cases if that is agreeable to the Senator.

Mr. ASHURST. Yes; that is quite agreeable.

Mr. McNARY. I do not want to impose it on the Senator.

Mr. ASHURST. No, Mr. President; I do not seek my own way. I do not care anything about what particular business the Senate transacts so long as the Senate shows some diligence and some application to duty.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, the Senator knows that when we go into executive session we are going to adjourn. Do not make any mistake about that.

Mr. McNARY. Of course we will adjourn. There are two contests. I do not know how long they will take, but it was rather agreed that they would come up this afternoon. So far as I am concerned, we can go along here indefinitely on this bill; but it was the expression of the Senator from New York and other Senators who had amendments to offer that we should not go forward any further with the bill to-day.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. May I ask the Senator from New York one question of detail which arose in the Committee on Territories before we leave the bill for the day? I call his attention to page 101, line 17, where the House text has been amended obviously for the purpose of broadening it so as to include Puerto Rico. Was it the intention to exclude Hawaii?

Mr. WAGNER. No; it was not.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator would have no objection, when we reach it, to including the word "Territories" throughout the bill?

Mr. WAGNER. Not at all. That ought to be corrected.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I thank the Senator.

PRODUCTION OF SILVER

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. McNARY. I do.

Mr. PITTMAN. There has been a great deal of discussion in the Senate during the last six months and throughout the world, I may say, with regard to what is called the silver problem. I regret to say that it is not generally understood. Many conceive that it is an attack on the gold standard. It is entirely an exchange proposition with which some of us have been dealing.

In February a year ago I introduced a resolution, which was referred to the Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate, which requested the President of the United States to call or obtain an international conference for the purpose of having governments agree, if possible, to suspend or abandon the policy and practice of debasing and melting up silver coins and selling the silver bullion derived therefrom on the market of the world. That resolution was unanimously approved by the Foreign Relations Committee, and unanimously adopted by the United States Senate. It was approved by legislative action of 11 States. The purpose was approved by the International Chamber of Commerce that met in Washington. Action by the International Chamber of Commerce was recommended by the United States Chamber of Commerce. The purpose was approved by the commercial bodies of many of the States.

All that I bring this up for is to disclose the fact that it was recognized that the depreciated purchasing power in our country of the depreciated silver money of other countries in comparison with our gold standard has raised an exchange problem that bore and is bearing very materially upon our export trade.

That was conceded. The cause of the sudden decrease in the price of silver was practically conceded. It was due to the debasing of silver coins and the melting up of silver coins that were in circulation in other countries. It was admitted that the mine supply had not increased, but, as a matter of fact, had decreased.

There was no way by which we could stop the British Government for India, for instance, from melting up its silver coin and dumping that silver on the market of the world, except by an international agreement which the British Government for India would find to its interest. The secretary of the treasury for India stated that he would be satisfied to limit the annual amount he would throw on the market of the world if the producers of silver would also limit themselves to a certain extent. It became absolutely essential to stop the dumping of silver, because India has probably over a billion ounces of silver in the form of silver coins which can be dumped. The world demand for silver has never been in excess of 250,000,000 ounces, and mine production has never been over 250,000,000 ounces. But when they adopted the policy in India of melting the silver coins and dumping on the market of the world the silver, with that enormous supply back of it, it destroyed confidence in it altogether, and everybody started to dumping, and the price of silver from 1929 to the present time has dropped over half. It dropped from 62 cents an ounce to 28 cents.

That affected the miner, of course, but the effect on the miner was insignificant, because our mining operations in this country are small by comparison with other industries. But, as was certified by the British economic commission, and by all the great industrialists and shippers of the world, many countries value their silver money at par as we value our silver dollars at such par, as well as 10-cent pieces and quarters and 50-cent pieces. But we value the silver money of other countries only at the value of the silver in the coin measured by the world market price. In other words, our own dollar to-day is worth only 23 cents, because it has seventy-eight one-hundredths of an ounce of silver in it, and silver is 28 cents an ounce; but that dollar circulates for a dollar. The Chinese dollar, however, which is of the same size as our dollar, does not circulate in our country, and when the Chinese wish to buy our products, they have to buy exchange. They have to give four and a half of their silver dollars for one of our dollars with which to buy our products, and they have ceased substantially buying our products. Worse than that, that condition has acted as the highest tariff wall in the world, over 400 per cent, with the result that there has been an enormous increase in cotton mills in China, they have increased their wheat fields enormously, and their flour mills tremendously. They have practically ceased to import cigarettes at all, because they buy their tobacco and take it over there and manufacture cigarettes.

Mind you, since 1929 our exports of raw cotton to China have almost trebled, but our exports of piece goods have dropped down half. Our greatest market for raw cotton was England. What is the result? To-day our exports of cotton to England are one-third in value what they were in 1929, because, as the British economic report shows, Great Britain's exports of cotton piece goods to China fell from 210,000,000 linear yards in 1929 to 64,000,000 linear yards in 1930, and consequently she had to reduce her factory capacity, as we did in the United States, with the result that there was not the demand for our raw cotton.

I am only bringing this to the attention of the Senate to show that all great economists in all countries realize that that has a depressing effect on trade and commerce.

Our exports of lumber to China have fallen off 50 per cent since 1929. Our exports of flour to China have fallen off 50 per cent since 1929. Our exports of automobiles to China have fallen off more than 50 per cent in that time. We have not only lost our market but we are bringing about a condition which will make it a permanent loss, and China is the greatest potential market for the United States in all the world. It is one market we can win, and we can win it because the Chinese trust us, and we are about the only people in the world they do trust, because we are closer to them, as far as trading is concerned, than any other nation, for the reason that for years to come they will have to use the things we produce in order to build up. But we have neglected that situation, and we are still neglecting that situation, under the influence of prejudice, because some imagine this silver question has something to do with the Bryan issue of 1896. It would seem that people who are interested in commerce and trade and exports of this country would try to ascertain facts, and not deal in imagination.

Can it be imagined, for instance, that all of the great commercial bodies of the Pacific coast would indorse the effort to restore the purchasing power of silver money, not in the United States but the purchasing power of silver money of other countries, in purchasing products in our country, if there were not something to it? Yet it is almost impossible to persuade those who are responsible for legislation, both in the executive branch and in Congress, to get out of their minds the impression that there is not some selfishness in this matter.

Finding it almost impossible to get an international conference on this subject, I finally introduced a bill in the Senate which will tend to meet the situation—just tend to meet the situation.

We could not get the miners of the United States to agree to restrict their production of silver, because 80 per cent of the silver produced in the United States is not from silver mines; it is a by-product of copper mines and lead mines and zinc mines, and the men who own those mines are not going to reduce their capacity below the demand for their material just because there are a few ounces of silver mixed in with the principal metal. So we could not do it in that way. But we found another way to do it, namely, to let the Government of the United States take the production of silver in the United States for a period of time and pay for it at the world market price with silver certificates, in other words, certificates of deposit.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. FESS. The Senator said that it seems impossible to get an international conference. I am of the opinion that that is not impossible unless our friends across the sea would refuse to go into a conference. I think the Senator's position would be strongly supported on this side of the aisle. Has the Senator read the plank in the platform recently adopted at Chicago on that question?

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, platforms are rarely definite in their meaning, and when they cross the sentiments and sympathies and desires of Government officials, they are generally set aside.

This body adopted a platform in February a year ago by unanimous vote, every Republican Senator, including the Senator from Ohio, who has just asked me a question, voting that it was the sense of this body that the President should call an international conference for the purpose of solving the silver money problem. That platform was adopted in February a year ago, but the President has not responded to that platform.

I have read the plank in the recently adopted Republican platform.

Mr. FESS. May I read the platform plank?

Mr. PITTMAN. I wish the Senator would, because it was so indefinite I can not remember it.

Mr. FESS. The plank was this:

> We favor the participation by the United States in an international conference to consider matters relating to monetary questions, including the position of silver exchange problems and commodity prices, and possible cooperative action concerning them.

That was unanimously adopted in the committee, and also by the convention.

Mr. PITTMAN. That is an amendment of the platform which we adopted when we adopted the resolution here unanimously, for which the Senator from Ohio voted.

Mr. FESS. I would think that if the Senator's leadership would include that in the platform to be adopted—and I have no doubt he can bring that about—there will be no difficulty in having the conference, if the powers of the world will agree.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the platform we adopted in the Senate by unanimous vote requested the President to initiate proceedings. We requested the President of the United States to call the conference. The plank the Senator has read states that the Republican convention favors our Government participating in conferences dealing with monetary questions. They did not favor the President calling a conference.

Why did they not put in the plank the very frank statement that they favored the President initiating such a conference. It was because the President does not want to initiate such a conference. It is because the President has never wanted to initiate it. That is true. That is not an inaccurate statement.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I think that is too broad a statement to make. I know that the President has taken up with foreign countries the question of a conference on silver.

Mr. PITTMAN. I admit that.

Mr. SMOOT. I know the countries he has already approached, and I know that up to the present time he has not received a favorable reply.

Mr. PITTMAN. Very well; we will admit all that for the sake of the argument. But let us take the history of this problem.

I said that my criticism was this, if it may be called a criticism, though it was not a criticism; it was merely a statement of fact.

In February a year ago we passed that resolution unanimously. It was reported out of the Foreign Relations Committee unanimously. Senators time and time again on the floor have asked me, when I was discussing the question, about the matter. Let us see what happened. Let us see what is the real history of the transaction.

I was directed by the subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations to go to China for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not the National Government of China and the Government of Japan not only needed this action, but whether they were in favor of it; also to find out from the chambers of commerce and business men and bankers over there whether the assertion in the report we made, that our exports were being destroyed by reason of that exchange value, was true or not. I found out that it was true. I found out that China was anxious to have an international conference. I found out that Japan was anxious to have an international conference. What happened?

On the day before I sailed from Seattle, about the middle of May, a statement was issued from the White House by the Assistant Secretary of State, Mr. Castle, I believe, in which he stated in effect that the President of the United States felt that some other government more interested in silver than was the United States should initiate the conference and that our Government would participate. That is the same expression that is used in the platforms to which I have referred.

I arrived in China on the first day of June. To show the interest that the National Government of China had in the matter at that time, I was met by members of their cabinet. We went right into consultation. They told us that the life of the National Government of China depended upon the restoration of the price of silver, that they could not pay their foreign debts with the exchange value of their money as it was, that they could not pay the interest on their debts, that they could not carry out their program of road building and railroad building because the taxes they collected were in silver and when they exchanged it for gold it took $4.50 of silver to get $1 of gold.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, does the Senator know why China declined to call a conference?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes; and I will tell the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. And does the Senator know why Mexico declined to call a conference?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes; and I will tell the Senator in just a moment. I had not intended going to the national capital of China for four days. There was in the conference that we had the day I arrived there a representative of our Government. In every conference that I had except two, which I slipped away to have, there was a representative of our Government. What happened? I decided to go immediately to Nanking, the capital, because the Minister of Finance would be there. On the day I arrived at Nanking the morning newspapers carried a telegram addressed by the President of the United States to the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] in Salt Lake City. I am relating these coincidences, which may not mean anything; but, nevertheless, I am relating them.

Mr. SMOOT. I can not connect it in any way, shape, or form. I never received a telegram from the President in my life in relation to China or Mexico. There is certainly something wrong, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. PITTMAN. Just a moment, and the Senator will find out there is nothing wrong. A telegram was addressed by the President of the United States to the senior Senator from Utah in Salt Lake City. I think it was June 2 or June 3. I am sure it was one or the other of those days. In that telegram the President of the United States said:

> I am now able to inform you that from informal conferences with the representatives of certain governments whose participation in the conference I deem essential that they oppose the holding of a conference at the present time, and therefore, in effect, it can not be held.

That, mind you, was in the morning papers when I arrived at Nanking, in China. Instantly Mr. Soong and the President of China and other cabinet officers said:

> There is no use having any further conference on the matter. If the United States is not going into an international conference by reason of the objection of certain governments, then we might as well drop the question.

But that was not all. About two weeks later the National Government of China was in such dire distress by reason of the exchange situation that Mr. Soong, the Minister of Finance, and other distinguished financial leaders there came to my office in the hotel and asked me then if China called such a conference, would the United States participate. I said that the last word I heard on that subject was the statement coming from Mr. Castle on behalf of the White House, that if some other government more interested in silver than the United States called it, we would participate; and I said I thought we would.

What happened? The next day came another statement from the White House, and what was that statement? It was that the administration did not believe that China was a proper government to issue such a call. Now we know from the statement of the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] that there are only two countries that had asked for a delay, because the senior Senator from Utah has heretofore stated that one of them was Great Britain and the other was possibly France. It has been stated on the floor of the Senate time and time again by me and by other Senators that a conference participated in by Canada and the United States and China and Australia and South American countries would have such a power with regard to trade and commerce and the regulation of exchange as between those countries that Great Britain could not stay out of it nor could France stay out of it.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The Senator has not mentioned that in the month of June there was published in the English press a notice which, as I remember it, was issued by the White House, saying that it was opposed even to discussing the silver question until the moratorium had been agreed to.

Mr. PITTMAN. That was published and I do not know that it was ever denied. However, that is newspaper matter and I am only discussing things now within my personal knowledge.

I will ask the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] to state right now the situation with regard to the message of the President wherein he said something about other governments.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator from Nevada will yield for that purpose——

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall briefly reply to the Senator. As he has stated, the President of the United States sent a telegram to my colleague, the contents of which were textually as stated by the Senator from Nevada. Certainly the telegram was susceptible of no other construction than that nations whose presence at an international conference was necessary had declined or refused to attend a conference called for that purpose. Shortly after the date of the telegram I returned to Washington and immediately called at the State Department for the purpose of ascertaining what governments, if any, had refused to attend an international silver conference in the event that one were called. From the information which I had received from various countries and from sources which I regarded as reliable, I could not believe that any important nation had refused to participate in a conference called to consider the silver question. At the State Department I was referred to the Assistant Secretary of State, Mr. Rogers, who, it was stated, was in charge of that branch of the department to which inquiries regarding silver, or an international conference regarding the same, were referred. I produced a copy of the President's telegram and requested to see the correspondence or communications between our Government and other governments in regard to the silver question or to an international conference; and I also asked the Assistant Secretary what nation had refused to participate in a conference if one were called or had objected to such conference being assembled.

The Secretary's statement, as I understood it, was that no nation had refused to attend a conference called for the purpose of considering the silver question. I specifically mentioned Great Britain and France and asked whether the Governments of these countries had declined to attend a conference for the consideration of the silver question. The Assistant Secretary replied that France was indifferent in the matter, but had signified her willingness to attend a conference if one were called. With respect to Great Britain, he said in substance that the position taken by Great Britain was that pending the settlement of the Indian question her Government hoped that no conference would be called. Reference was made to the round-table conference that was to be held in October—and my interview with the Assistant Secretary was before October—and as I understood the Assistant Secretary, Great Britain preferred that no silver conference be called pending the round-table conference meeting in London in October. I then inquired of the Assistant Secretary if Great Britain or any other country had refused to attend a silver conference if one were called and his answer was "no."

Mr. PITTMAN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. KING. May I allude to one further matter. Senators will recall that in May of last year the International Chamber of Commerce convened in Washington. At that conference a resolution was adopted which, in substance, declared that because of the serious consequences of the present silver situation to the economic condition of the world, a world conference should be called during 1931, at which all interested parties might be heard for the purpose of seeking a solution to the silver problem; resolution also urged the international committee to bring the matter, namely, the convening of an international silver conference, to the attention of their respective governments.

One of the influential delegates to the International Chamber of Commerce conference was Doctor Pei, who represented the Chamber of Commerce of China. I might add that Doctor Pei was at that time and is now, so far as I know, president of the Chinese Bank of London and of a bank in Shanghai, China. Immediately after the conference adjourned he went to London and there conferred with the officials of the British Government with respect to the calling of a silver conference and the attitude of the British Government in respect to the silver question.

I should add that Doctor Pei took an important part in the meeting of the International Chamber of Commerce conference and offered a resolution which was the basis of the one adopted declaring in favor of an international conference to deal with the silver question. Several weeks after Doctor Pei's departure from the United States he communicated with me from London and stated in substance that the British Government was not opposed to an international silver conference being called, but preferred, in view of the near approach of the round-table conference, that such silver conference should not be held in advance of the Indian conference in October. As I recall, in his communication he stated that if it were not for the Indian situation he believed that the British Government would call the conference; but, notwithstanding the Indian situation, if some other government called the conference the British Government would participate.

I believe that the Prime Minister of England would look with favor upon silver's rehabilitation. In Mr. Wagel's book, recently written, he quotes a statement made by Mr. MacDonald which is indicative of his attitude toward the silver question. The statement is in the form of questions and is substantially as follows:

> * * * Is finance to be based upon one certain metal? Is credit to be controlled by the supply, demand, and distribution of that particular metal? Is the policy, theory, and practice which we accept and express in our coinage to thwart our commercial welfare? * * *

I submit that these questions indicate that Mr. MacDonald does not believe that the gold standard is adequate, but that a plan should be adopted that would broaden the metallic base upon which to rest the world's currencies and credits.

I repeat, having trespassed upon the time of the Senator, that, so far as I can learn, no government has refused to take part in any conference called to consider the silver question.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, that is the history of that matter. Let me tell the Senate one other thing.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, before the Senator proceeds may I ask my colleague a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COPELAND in the chair). Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the senior Senator from Utah?

Mr. PITTMAN. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to get the whole story so I can understand the facts. Did the State Department say anything in relation to Mexico refusing to call a conference?

Mr. KING. No.

Mr. SMOOT. I wanted to be sure about that.

Mr. KING. I asked the question categorically if any nation had refused, and Mr. Rogers said "No."

Mr. SMOOT. That would include Mexico.

Mr. KING. I did not mention Mexico specifically.

Mr. SMOOT. But I say it would include Mexico.

Mr. KING. I think so; but I did mention specifically Japan, France, and Great Britain.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I wish to show the attitude of Great Britain. I am not going to call attention to all the unofficial statements made by great industrialists and financiers and economists of Great Britain, because they are all in a letter which I am going to file, some written by members of the House of Parliament, all agreeing that an international conference on this subject is demanded.

Great Britain pays more attention to her foreign commerce than we do. Great Britain realized that she had lost a large proportion of her trade with China. When British exports of cotton piece goods dropped off from 210,000,000 linear yards in 1929 to 64,000,000 yards in 1930, it aroused the British people, and they created an economic commission, headed by Sir Ernest Thompson, and composed of the ablest experts in England.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes; if it will not break up the present line of thought.

Mr. DILL. The question I desire to ask is on the subject which the Senator is now discussing. I should like to get the Senator's understanding as to what England is doing now as to the dumping silver from India on the world market?

Mr. PITTMAN. The Indian Government is still dumping.

Mr. DILL. Does the Senator know at what rate?

Mr. PITTMAN. It can not be stated definitely, but it is at about the same rate, which would amount to about 35,000,000 ounces a year.

Mr. President, Great Britain created this commission to go to the Orient and find out what was the matter with her export trade with China. The commission spent £80,000 in their work and remained six months, and they have written the most comprehensive and searching report that I have ever read on the subject. Let me read a sentence or two from the report.

> Great Britain has so large an interest in China's trade that we trust she may be among the foremost to take action with a view to ascertaining what can be done by international agreement to raise the value of silver. We should be among the first to endeavor to arrive at an international understanding for reestablishing silver as a standard basis of credit. The flow of gold to America and France and the sales of silver by India are all factors in a serious situation. The probable shortage of gold in the near future and the overproduction of silver at the present time have raised issues that can not be ignored. There would appear to be no relief from present world conditions unless and until the fundamental matter of currency receives consideration. Upon some solution of this problem hangs the future of international commerce.

That is from the report of the British commission. Is it possible that when this official report comes in, that there is no desire on the part of the British Government to do anything? I should like to read the entire report, but I will merely read a few more lines from it.

I had some correspondence with Mr. Ogden Mills on this subject, and I am going to place the whole correspondence in the RECORD. It deals with the silver problem from the viewpoint of the Treasury Department and from the viewpoint of those in this body who differ with the department. If there is any Senator who desires to familiarize himself with this subject, I take it that this correspondence which has gone on for several months will not only give him the viewpoint of the Treasury Department, will not only outline the issues, but will give the arguments and the facts, and I shall ask later that it may be printed in the RECORD. The report of the British economic commission to the Far East is so valuable that I will read a few more lines from it:

> There exists in China to-day one outstanding problem which faces all nations desirous of selling their goods in the China market. The deplorably low silver values, and the consequently much reduced buying of the vast populace, are factors contributing to restrict the increase of imports into China from foreign countries. Finding it increasingly difficult to buy (for payment in gold) goods from abroad, China will be driven to discover ways and means of producing her own requirements. Should she continue to remain on a greatly depreciated silver basis for some years, it is obvious that she will of necessity not only quickly enlarge her industrial capacity and manufacture goods now made in foreign countries, but will be able to export many of such goods to markets abroad now being served by Great Britain. The potentiality of China with her cheap labor, low standard of living, and depreciated currency is too obvious to require special emphasis. Once a country is driven in on her own resources there arises the possibility of a market being permanently lost. The first and foremost problem for Great Britain is that of supplying China with manufactured goods, but it does not stand alone. Any falling off in trade automatically brings about a corresponding reduction in the income of the British ships from freight, and, concurrently, a reduction in insurance premia payable to British companies.
> Consideration of China's currency problem in another direction seems desirable. With every move downwards in silver values China has to bear increasing financial burdens arising from the payment in gold of interest on foreign loans. She has to meet these obligations by imposing new duties which in their turn further restrict imports. China's funded debt due to foreign countries in principal and interest on the 1st of January, 1931, stood at £202,000,000. In addition, there is a considerable floating debt. A very large portion of these obligations is due to British subjects and institutions. If silver falls still lower or even remains at the present level, payment of interest on foreign loans might be affected, much damage to British interests being caused.

Here is more proof from this British report as to what China wanted. I call attention particularly to this statement in this report:

> The governor of the Bank of China is in touch with the International Chamber of Commerce. He has called the international chamber's attention to the serious handicap imposed on China's external trade by the continued depreciation of silver and has stated that the plans for the consolidation of Chinese foreign debts have been considerably disturbed thereby. He asks for an early international conference to consider the question. The response to this request has been favorable, and as a preliminary the executive committee of the International Chamber of Commerce adopted a resolution calling on all national committees and members to urge their governments to take the silver problem into their early consideration in consultation with other governments, including the Chinese Government.

So it is disclosed that the British mission sent to China found that it was the low price of silver that was destroying the exports of Great Britain to China, and they found there was necessity for immediate international action for the purpose of restoring the purchasing power of silver. They quote in this report the president of the Bank of China, who was deeply disturbed about the matter and was in consultation with the International Chamber of Commerce and with other governments, begging for an international conference so as to save the National Government of China. The fall or disruption of the National Government of China which took place recently was caused by the low price of silver, because, as Mr. Soong told me, no government in China could continue to exist with the exchange value against its silver money such as it was. They could not carry out any program; they could not pay interest on their debt; they could not establish credit; they could not borrow any more money abroad; they could not buy rails for their railroads; they could not buy engines; they could not buy cars; they could not buy road machinery; they could do nothing to carry out their program; and they had to fall. Yet for over a year, with a unanimous expression of opinion on the part of the Senate to the President of the United States that something be done, he has done nothing, when our trade with China has suffered more than has the trade of any other country unless it be that of Great Britain, and that is because both of us were on the gold standard and the exchange of silver for gold was four and a half to one.

Nothing at all has been done. Bowing to other countries! If some other country more interested in silver would call a conference we would participate! There is not any country in the world as much interested in the restoration of the purchasing power of silver money as we are. We have the largest trade with China and it ought to be many times larger than it is, but it has been cut to pieces, as the report of the British economic mission shows, by reason of the fact that China's silver money was so cheap by comparison with our gold-standard money that the Chinese could not buy from us. It is this Government that should take the initiative. Participate! Why not initiate, when we see our shipments of flour to China fall off 50 per cent since 1929; when we see our lumber exports to China fall off 50 per cent since 1929; when we see our automobile exports fall off 65 per cent since 1929; when we see our exports of canned milk to China drop off 50 per cent since 1929; is it a matter that does not interest us? Of course if the administration does not know what the British economic mission does know and has so emphatically stated, if the administration does not know what Sir Cunliffe-Owen, of Great Britain, and what Sir Henri Deterding know and what all the great industrialists and financiers of Great Britain know, then it is time to get somebody in the Department of Commerce and the Treasury Department who can find out, and, if they can not get the statistics, I will be very happy to mail them the report of the British economic commission.

Let us cease talking about participating if somebody else will do something. That is just about what we have been doing now for two or three years. We are willing to participate, but not to initiate, and so we do nothing. We have not the boldness to call a conference, and yet we would be at a greater advantage if an economic conference were held in the United States than we would if such a conference were held in Europe.

As I say, it seems absolutely hopeless to get the President of the United States to take any initiative in this matter. We need not disguise the fact from ourselves. We know well enough that the Treasury Department has been opposed and is now opposed to it. I know that. I am not speaking as to what attitude the President now takes on it, because I have not conversed with the President, nor do I assume to quote him; but I know the attitude of the Treasury Department.

Of course, this is an international matter, as the British commission says, and a complete and full solution of the problem can be brought about only through international conferences and agreements; but as I told you, there is a steady oversupply of silver flowing into the markets of the world from the melting up of the silver coins of India, and we can not stop it except by an international agreement, and we can not get a conference. Nor can we agree not to produce any more silver, for the simple reason that it is a by-product, as I said before. Therefore to try to meet this oversupply of silver in the world coming from the melting up of the silver coins of India, I introduced a bill which has for its purpose temporarily taking off the markets of the world the silver produced by the mines of the United States.

That would not mean much. We produced last year only 31,000,000 ounces of silver. The world produced last year only 160,000,000 ounces of silver. But if we could temporarily take off the markets of the world the 31,000,000 ounces of silver that we are producing, it would offset the oversupply of 35,000,000 ounces of India. Then we would bring about the status quo that existed in 1929 and prior thereto. We would have the natural mine supply, and we would have the natural demand; and that supply has been uniform throughout the ages—not only uniform in its steady increase of only about 2 per cent per annum but uniform with relation to the production of gold.

There never have been over 14 ounces of silver produced to 1 ounce of gold in a normal year. Nature is as remarkable in that as in everything else. People have an idea that there is an unlimited quantity of silver somewhere, and yet miners have hunted it the world over.

This bill does not cost the Government anything. They buying this silver at the market price, and they pay for it with silver certificates, or certificates of deposit, you might call them, if you want to. It is nothing new. We have to-day $500,000,000 of silver certificates in circulation throughout this country, and they have been in circulation for over 40 years. We have a standard silver dollar lying in the Treasury behind each one of these certificates, it is true, for redemption if the certificates come in, but they rarely come in, because people nowadays prefer to use paper money. They have never depreciated. It is the best money we have, because it is the handiest. It is the dollar bills, mostly, moving around through people's pockets. It is the only kind of money a man can get to-day, probably. It does not increase the price to the miner. He can get just as much gold for his silver as he can get in silver certificates from the Treasury. It means nothing to him, except that it is the only method by which the producers in the United States can meet the demand of the British Government in India that we reduce our export of metal on the markets of the world. It is the only way we can do it.

It does not mean anything in inflation, does it? Why, there are only 2,700,000 ounces of silver produced each month in this country. The present price is 28 cents an ounce. That does not mean $1,000,000 in currency added to the circulation monthly. Our Government, through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act and the Glass-Steagall bill, attempted to make currency available up into the billions, and they have not succeeded. This would add only a million dollars a month to the circulation. It would move to the producer, and through him to the miner. It would go into the purchase of materials to be used in the mines. It would not be inflation.

Of course, we are met with the objection that "silver is a commodity, and why favor this commodity." It is no more a commodity than gold. Over half of the gold now being produced in the world is used not as money but in the arts and sciences, while, on the other hand, four-fifths of all the silver ever produced in the world and now being produced is used for monetary purposes, and only one-fifth of it is used in the arts and sciences.

But some will say, "It is not money in our country." I will not argue that question. It just happens that we have nearly a billion dollars of silver money in circulation in this country. To-day it constitutes nearly 20 per cent of our money. We are not worried about that. If Great Britain and Germany and Italy and other countries had had one-twentieth of their reserves in silver, as we have, with silver certificates circulating against it, it would have been a tremendous relief from the strain on their gold reserves, which did happen.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I am not going to speak any longer on this subject, Mr. President; but I ask leave to place in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, correspondence with Mr. Ogden Mills, Secretary of the Treasury, covering several months' time, primarily directed to a discussion of the bill which is now pending in the Committee on Banking and Currency, and which I believe is going to receive a favorable report on Monday. I place it in the RECORD for the information that it will furnish to any Senator who desires to vote on this subject. I think every question is discussed. I think the issue is so clearly drawn that it is worth while to read it, and I simply ask that that correspondence go in as part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, March 8, 1932.

Hon. OGDEN L. MILLS,
The Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: On February 11 of this year I introduced a bill authorizing the Treasury Department to purchase silver produced in the United States at the market price of such silver, to be paid for in silver certificates of the denominations of $10, $5, and $1. This bill is designated as S. 3606. The bill was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency of the United States Senate. I am informed that the bill, according to the custom in such matters, has been referred to you for such comment as you see fit to make.

This is the first time that I have ever written to any department with regard to any bill referred to it for its consideration. I would not do so in this case except for the fact that I deem the proposed legislation of such vital importance that I feel that it should receive your personal consideration.

It is admitted, I believe, by substantially all economists and financiers who have given careful study to the disruption of international monetary exchange that the extreme and unusual low price of silver in its effect upon the exchange value of silver money with the money of gold-standard countries has been a material factor in the depression of international trade and commerce and the consequent oversupply of commodities in the domestic markets.

The subcommittee of the Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate, of which I am chairman, and which was authorized to study this and related questions, found as a fact that the depressed price of silver had, through its effect upon international monetary exchange, been a chief factor in the depression of international trade, the extraordinary depression in our exports and the oversupply of commodities in our domestic markets. This report was adopted by the full committee on Foreign Relations of the United States Senate.

At the time of making the report I introduced a resolution wherein the Senate of the United States respectfully requested the President to call or obtain an international conference or conferences for the purpose of having governments agree to abandon or suspend the policy and practice of debasing and melting up silver coins and selling the silver thus derived upon the markets of the world, and, further, to have governments agree, if possible, upon the status and uses of silver as money. This resolution was unanimously adopted by the United States Senate in February, 1931. No action has been taken by the President.

During this session of Congress a number of bills have been introduced in the Senate and the House looking to legislative action by our Government. I hesitated to introduce any bills looking to separate action by our Government so long as there was any encouragement for international action.

One bill introduced in the Senate, however, by Senator WHEELER, of Montana, provides for the free and unlimited coinage of American silver at the ratio of 16 to 1. This bill naturally has received a great deal of support throughout the country. At the time that Senator WHEELER discussed in the Senate his proposed bill I followed him in an address in which I frankly stated that I did not believe that there was any chance for the consideration of such measure at this session of Congress or at any time in the near future.

I also stated in that address, which was very brief, that the committee of which I am chairman has not and does not seek to change or in any manner disturb our gold standard, but rather to eliminate the legislative and executive action adopted by various gold-standard governments injurious to the silver standard of other countries and depressive of the purchasing power of silver money. I personally believe that those governments which are accustomed to using the gold standard as a measure of value and which are so situated that they may maintain such standard should be encouraged in the sustaining of the gold standard. I personally feel also that it is best for those countries which are accustomed to using silver chiefly as money, and which are not familiar with the gold standard or are incapable of establishing it, should receive equal encouragement in the sustaining of their silver standard and in the maintenance of the exchange value of their silver money.

It is unfortunate that so many of our statesmen are unfamiliar with the production, consumption, and use of both gold and silver. I believe that leading economists and financiers of the world realize that the production of gold is not maintaining pace with the demand for this metal as a monetary base. These same economists and financiers, however, do not realize that there is a limit to the supply of silver in the world as well as gold, that its production has not only maintained a parity with the production of gold of about 14 ounces of silver to 1 of gold through the ages, but that the production of silver is not maintaining pace with the monetary demand for this metal.

Again, while gold-standard countries treat silver as a commodity, in fact it is no more a commodity than gold. Nearly half of the annual mine production of gold is used as a commodity in the arts and sciences. Four-fifths of all the silver ever produced and now being produced is used for monetary purposes, while only one-fifth of such production is used in the arts, sciences, and manufactures.

The production of silver in the world in 1931 was less than it was in the pre-war period of 1913. The production of silver is more regular than the production of gold. There are many gold mines, while there are few silver mines. Two-thirds of the silver produced in the world is as a by-product in the mining of other metals, and thus the production of silver is automatically controlled by the demand for such metals.

I can not understand the fear that seems to exist in the financial departments of certain governments that an intergovernmental conference might be dangerous. Such fears are not indulged in by the leading statesmen and economists of such governments. The London conference on disarmament could have adopted policies that would have meant increased militarism, but we were not afraid to take part in such conference because our Government would not have been bound by any determination that we might have considered antagonistic to our interests or to the principles that we hold.

There is no doubt that the extreme and unusual depression in the price of silver is due to the unnatural supply of the metal derived from the debasing and melting up of silver coins by governments and the dumping of such silver on the market of the world, and not to overproduction of mines. No government to-day except the British Government for India is pursuing the policy and practice of melting up silver coins. Undoubtedly every government would be ready to agree to abandon this practice and policy. If nothing else could be agreed upon, this alone would relieve the situation and reestablish to a great extent the price of silver on the law of natural supply and demand.

Our people, as well as the people of the world, however, are becoming impatient with inaction. Legislators are attempting to remedy the situation through individual government action. To meet this demand and to substitute what may be considered sound legislation for proposed acts that will meet too strong conservative opposition, I have introduced the bill I am referring to in this letter.

The first result of the act, if it becomes law, will be to allow the producers in the United States to withdraw from the world supply the American production, which for 1931 will be less than 31,000,000 ounces. In 1931 the British Government for India dumped upon the market of the world 35,000,000 ounces of silver derived from the melting up of silver rupee coins of India. The withdrawal of the American production from the world market would, therefore, to a certain extent offset such dumping from India and tend to stabilize the market upon the basis of natural supply and demand.

The second effect will be to furnish a sound currency for circulation in the United States and use by national banks and Federal reserve banks as a part of their legal reserve. At the present time, as the production of silver in the United States is about 2,500,000 ounces a month, and as silver is 30 cents an ounce, it would add approximately $750,000 a month to our circulating currency.

This must seem infinitesimal when, at the present time, we are seeking, through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act and the Glass Banking Act, to increase our circulating currency two or three billion dollars almost immediately. This additional currency, I take it, is only an emergency issue that will be withdrawn from circulation as rapidly as conditions will permit, and possibly too rapidly, as has been done in the past.

Certainly the issue of this silver-certificate currency is demanded at the present time, and when the contraction of the currency issued under the acts I have referred to commences to take place, in conjunction with the continual contraction of national bank-note circulation, the small amount of such issue of silver certificates can have no detrimental effect, and may tend to offset precipitate deflation.

The third effect of the act will be to enlarge the legal tender qualifications of the silver certificate. It makes such certificates full legal tender. This adds to their qualifications as a part of the legal reserves of national banking associations and Federal reserve banks. It does not add, however, to any great extent to their value as circulating currency, as the full value of such currency has never been questioned.

We have had silver certificates in circulation since 1878. The first silver purchased and even the silver purchased under the act of 1890 was purchased with gold or currency convertible into gold. Subsequently, it is true, Treasury certificates and gold notes were taken up by an issue of silver certificates which were only redeemable in standard silver dollars and had no gold security. These certificates, however, have always circulated freely and have been accepted without complaint or depreciation. While they are not legal tender in the full sense, they are legal tender for customs dues, imposts, and public dues. This demand for such certificates was ample to guarantee their legal tender value.

Again, the present circulating silver certificates are secured only by standard silver dollars in the United States Treasury and by act of Congress requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to maintain the parity of all currency issued. Under the bill that I have introduced, all of the silver purchased by the silver certificates is held in a special fund, not only for the purpose of the redemption of each dollar certificate by a standard silver dollar, but for the additional security against depreciation.

For instance, at the present time a $1 silver certificate would purchase in excess of 3 ounces of silver. Approximately seventy-eight one-hundredths of an ounce of such silver would be coined into a standard silver dollar, leaving as additional security for the redemption of that silver certificate enough silver to coin three additional silver dollars. In other words, if it were necessary to meet a depreciation of the silver certificate such certificate could be redeemed by four standard silver dollars instead of one. Whether silver goes up or goes down, the entire silver purchased at the market price with the silver certificates would always be in the possession of the Treasury Department in a special fund. I assume that everyone admits that silver has reached the bottom.

This suggested act is the least that our Government can do for the restoration of the purchasing power of silver money throughout the world and the reestablishment of the equilibrium of exchange between gold-standard countries and silver-money-using countries.

Realizing as I do your great ability as an economist and financier and your wide knowledge of these subjects, I have taken the liberty for the first time since I have been in the United States Senate of requesting a Secretary of any of our great departments to give his personal consideration to a bill that has been referred by a Senate committee to his department for consideration and comment. I sincerely desire to be advised by you with regard to this legislation and as to your views on the various subjects that I have discussed in this letter.

I would be happy to offer any amendments to the legislation that I have introduced that wisdom should seem to require, or to take such other steps looking to the remedying of the unfortunate exchange situation to which I have referred that may be deemed advisable at the present time.

I am inclosing, for the purpose of aiding you in your consideration of this matter, an excerpt from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 11, 1932, containing a copy of the bill referred to and also certain interpretations of the bill made by me that were filed at the same time.

With expressions of respect, I am, sincerely,

KEY PITTMAN.

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, May 2, 1932.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have your recent letter inclosing a copy of S. 3606, "to authorize the purchase by the Government of American-produced silver, to provide for the issuance of silver certificates in payment therefor, to provide for the coinage of such silver, and for other purposes," and requesting my opinion on the present silver situation and the proposed bill.

The bill provides for purchases of domestically produced silver by the Director of the Mint in amounts not to exceed 5,000,000 ounces per month at the current market price for the metal in the United States, and for the issuance of silver certificates in amounts necessary to pay for the purchases. The new certificates and all other silver certificates previously issued by the Government would be given full legal tender status and, furthermore, would be counted as lawful reserve when held by national banks or by Federal reserve banks.

You have indicated very clearly your reasons for urging the Congress to act favorably on the proposed bill. In your opinion the decline in the price of silver has been one of the important factors in the world-wide depression in which the price of silver has also been adversely affected by sales of the metal by countries which are demonetizing silver. Although you believe that the most appropriate solution would be an international agreement to continue the use of silver for monetary purposes wherever possible, you propose the present measure in order that the United States Government may afford some immediate relief.

I am in agreement with you as to the seriousness of the present low prices of silver and of other commodities and of the hardship which has accompanied the decline in the general price level during the past two years. However, I believe that the low prices of silver, as well as of other commodities, reflect conditions which must be remedied by readjustments in basic conditions rather than through the creation of artificial demand.

As I see it, the rapid decline in silver prices to the now record low level is to be accounted for chiefly by reference to the following major factors: (1) World-wide depression accompanied by general declines in commodity prices; (2) sale of silver by governments, more particularly the Indian Government; (3) the effect of the large silver holdings of the Indian Government which overhang the market as a potential increase in the supply already burdensome; (4) maintenance of production at a high level.

The relation of the low price of silver to the international trade of countries on the silver standard has, I believe, not always been clearly presented. Temporarily the fall in the price of silver disorganizes the exchanges and tends to promote exports and discourage imports. But in the long run the international purchasing power of these countries, such as China, is not determined by the value of their silver holdings, but by the value of the raw materials, manufactures, and services which they have to offer foreign purchasers. These do not include silver in an important degree. In fact, China and India are customarily importers, not exporters, of silver.

To the extent that changes in the monetary uses of the metal have been a factor in the depressed price of silver, the problem would seem to be similar to that of a commodity, one of the uses of which has been modified. In such cases a readjustment eventually takes place in the market for the commodity whereby either new uses are developed for the available supply or the supply is adjusted to the reduced demand. I agree, however, that it would be highly desirable if foreign governments could be induced to restore the previous standard of their silver coins.

From the point of view of this country's currency system, it is the opinion of the Treasury that the currency features of the proposed bill do not represent a necessary or sound use of silver. The currency requirements of the country are adequately provided for in the Federal reserve act and by the operations of the Federal reserve system, particularly in view of the recently enacted legislation liberalizing certain provisions of that act. Changes in the money in circulation are determined by the magnitude of the supply necessary to do the country's currency business under the conditions existing at the time. The Federal reserve banks, which have the power to issue currency and extend credit on the basis of discounts for member banks and transactions in the open market, operate to provide the country with a flexible amount of currency which readily adjusts itself to the changing requirements of the public. From the point of view of providing for the country's currency requirements on the most effective and economical basis, the suggested purchases of silver and issue of silver certificates would be entirely unnecessary.

In this connection I should like to point out that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the Glass-Steagall bill are not expected to result in a marked increase in the money in circulation, except to the extent that the revival of business may call for increased circulation. These measures are designed to give greater flexibility to our credit system in meeting the unusual liquidation of credit which has accompanied the later stages of business depression and to broaden the base for credit expansion. Although the Glass-Steagall Act provides greater flexibility in the security for Federal reserve notes, an increase in the money in circulation is not necessary for the general purposes of the reconstruction program.

Under the proposed bill the United States would in effect be offering artificial support to the silver market, the benefits of which would accrue entirely to the American silver producers. Public moneys would be expended for a commodity which under the operation of the bill would be a dead asset to the Government. Only a limited amount of silver coin is needed for circulation. It would not be possible for the Government to dispose of the silver without interfering with the major purpose of the bill; that is, the stabilization of the silver market. If, as you assume, the gold standard for our currency is to be continued, the acquisition of large amounts of silver by the Government would in no way improve the Treasury's ability to maintain the proposed silver certificates on a parity with the standard gold dollar. Ultimately the purchases of silver under the bill would in fact tend to lessen its ability to do so.

To authorize silver certificates held by national banks to be counted by them as legal reserves would be inconsistent with the present system of reserves now provided. The reserves of national banks as well as other member banks of the Federal reserve system must by law be maintained in the form of deposits with Federal reserve banks. It would be unsound to make an arbitrary revision of member bank reserve requirements without due consideration for all factors involved, including the effect of such revisions on the structure and operations of the Federal reserve system, particularly since member bank reserve requirements as provided in the Federal reserve act have recently been the subject of study by the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency and by the Federal Reserve Board.

In view of these considerations, I should doubt the wisdom of the bill in question.

Very truly yours,

OGDEN L. MILLS,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. KEY PITTMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, May 9, 1932.

Hon. OGDEN L. MILLS,
The Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I am pleased to receive your very interesting letter of May 2 in reply to my letter addressed to you under date of March 8, relative to Senate bill 3606, to authorize the purchase by the Government of silver produced in the United States with silver certificates and at the market price.

I am pleased by your statement, in which you say, "I am in agreement with you as to the seriousness of the present low prices of silver and of other commodities and of the hardship which has accompanied the decline in the general price level during the past two years."

It is also gratifying to read your statement in your letter, wherein you say, "I agree, however, that it would be highly desirable if foreign governments could be induced to restore the previous standard of their silver coins."

I am at a loss to understand why you are interested in the fineness of the silver coins of other countries in view of the position you take in other portions of your letter. If the reduction in the fineness of the silver coins of other countries has in no way affected our trade and commerce, in what manner are we interested? If the restoration of the previous standard of their silver coins would in no way affect our trade and commerce, in what manner are we interested?

It is true that you account for "the rapid decline in silver prices to the now record low level" to "sale of silver by governments, more particularly the Indian Government" and "the effect of the large silver holdings of the Indian Government which overhang the market as a potential increase in the supply already burdensome."

In what way is such supply "already burdensome"? You mean that it is burdensome in that it has beaten down the price of silver? It is evident from your letter that you have so little interest in the production of silver in the United States that you are unwilling to favor any action that will tend to protect it. Your letter would indicate that you believe that the depreciated price of silver and the consequent low exchange value of silver money with our gold-standard money has no material effect upon our export trade. What do you mean, therefore, by the oversupply of silver as burdensome? I have as clearly as possible stated in my letter to you wherein I consider that such oversupply is not only burdensome but has depressed the price of silver throughout the world to the enormous injury of our expert trade with silver-money-using countries.

You are right in your statement that China is an importer and not an exporter of silver. So is India, with the exception of exportations by the Government. These countries, since the beginning of time, have consumed two-thirds of all the silver the mines of the world have ever produced, and are even now, under the most adverse circumstances, consuming substantially the same amount of silver. Of course, these countries do not export silver, because they use it as money, as a representative of values, of wealth, and an instrument of trade and commerce.

It is true that business in China has prospered under the depressed price of silver because it has acted as a prohibitive tariff wall would act in preventing imports by China from gold-standard countries while at the same time tending to increase her exports to such countries. The Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce of our own Department of Commerce discloses this fact quite clearly. China still exports large quantities of silk to us. The exporters, who are largely foreigners, get the gold from us and pay the Chinese producers of silk in silver. Such gold does not remain in the hands of the people of China.

Whilst the great cities of China have been booming by reason of the depressed price of silver, the people of these cities have practically ceased to buy from us. I base this statement upon our trade reports issued through the Department of Commerce and the State Department. If you desire me to quote them, I will take pleasure in doing so.

The British economic report for the Far East for 1930–31 states that the depressed price of silver is destroying British trade in China. The report cites the fact that Great Britain's exports of cotton piece goods to China fell off from 210,000,000 linear yards in 1929 to 64,000,000 linear yards in 1930. In this same report it is stated, "The continued depreciation of the value of silver has enormously reduced the purchasing power of China, and, if it continues, will hasten the growth of industries in China, the manufactures of which will compete with imported products from Great Britain. Reduction in the value of silver also increased the difficulties of China in meeting interest on foreign loans, and so compels her to raise further revenue by increasing import duties."

Sir Hugo Cunliffe-Owen, Bt., head of the British tobacco trust, published an article on this subject in the Financial Times, of London, on September 23, 1931. He says:

"What, then, are the causes of our economic and financial troubles? Put very briefly, they are the appreciation of gold in gold-standard countries and the depreciation of silver in silver-standard countries. * * *

"The fall in commodity prices is common to all gold-standard countries, but no such fall has occurred in China, that vast potential market for British goods, which still operates on a complex silver standard.

"The reason for this distinction is that silver, the Chinese standard of value, is itself regarded by the western world as an ordinary commodity and has depreciated heavily in terms of gold along with the general trend of commodity prices.

"The importance of this fact, from the point of view of China's purchasing power abroad, is obvious, but its effects are severe also in other countries."

This effect upon gold-standard countries of the depreciated exchange value of silver money has been publicly concurred in by such great business men and shippers as Sir Henri W. A. Deterding, managing director of the Royal Dutch Combine; Lord Hunsdon; Sir William Dampier; the Right Hon. L. S. Amery, M. P.; the Right Hon. Sir Robert Horne; Dr. J. Hans, of Vienna; Holger Koefoed, economist of the Norwegian Bankers' Association; Sir Osborne A. Smith, governor of the Imperial Bank of India; and numerous other distinguished economists, financiers, and business men.

As I deem this subject of so much importance, I know that you will bear with me in quoting a few statements from prominent Americans relative to this subject.

President Hoover, speaking before the American Bankers' Association, at Cleveland, October 2, 1930:

"The buying power of India and China, dependent upon the price of silver, has been affected."

Julius H. Barnes, chairman of President Hoover's national business survey committee, in an article written by Mr. Barnes in the New York Times of November 2, 1930:

"The final mistake was made of treating silver as a commodity although it still represented resources and capital and credit to more than half of the population of the world. Silver, which had been a standard money of the world for 20 centuries was in a few months to be treated in the market as a commodity, without mature consideration as to the effect on the initiative and confidence of a thousand million people. A price of silver which fluctuated from $1.35, some few years ago, to 35 cents to-day, and yet symbolizes the credit and resources of a great people, could not but harm the business structure of the world."

Mark Sullivan, writing from Washington in June:

"The purchasing power of all Asia is reduced by the fall in the price of silver. This in turn diminishes the purchasing power of Europe. The final net is reduced volume of international trade, including American exports. The same cause accounts, in part certainly, within Asia, for domestic disturbances, which in the case of China are described in terms of communism and of India in terms of salt."

Wall Street Journal, in a survey of business conditions:

"The trade with China is of vast importance to the commercial nations of the world.

"With the United States alone it amounts to over $300,000,000 a year. Indirectly its trade with the United States is much more. One instance is that of cotton. It is one of England's greatest customers for cotton goods, which England makes from American cotton. The drop in silver means that Chinese exchange must decline. The purchasing power of silver therefore reacts on all countries with merchandise to sell. China is not only a purchaser of goods but a borrower in the money markets of the world."

Dr. Julius Klein, Assistant Secretary of Commerce, in a statement to the subcommittee of the Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate, made on June 26, 1930:

"In explanation of the considerable loss in both our import and export trade with China, three principal factors may be emphasized: (1) The renewal of extensive and energetic military activities in north-central China and the Yangtze Valley throughout the first half of 1930; (2) the lower prices obtaining in the world markets for many commodities, and particularly those which figure most importantly in China's exports; and (3) the low price of silver. These three factors, as well as minor contributing ones, all blend into the one general cause for the reduction of China's trade; that is, the reduction in China's purchasing power brought about by them."

And again:

"China being on a silver basis receives all of her income in China in silver, and all she receives from abroad must be paid for in silver, but upon a gold valuation. From our Table II we note that the average dollar value of the Shanghai tael in 1928 was 64.30 gold cents; in 1929, 58.42 cents; in May, 1930, 44.69 cents; and July 22, 1930, 36.74 cents. A simple way to state the problem is the obvious one that, other things being equal, China can not buy as much goods from abroad for 36 cents as it could for 64 cents."

The Irving Trust Co., of New York, in the Mid-Month Review of Business for December, 1930:

"Inasmuch as China is on a silver basis, her purchasing power in terms of imports has been melting away and thus American sales have woefully declined. In addition, the Chinese are suffering from a world-wide decline in the gold prices of the commodities which they export. It seems safe to infer that the silver catastrophe has been a major factor in the unrest in India and economic crisis in China. If so, the full effects of the situation have not yet been witnessed."

Department of Commerce report of February 4, 1931:

"The silver situation continues to be the all-absorbing topic of interest in Shanghai business circles. * * * The outlook is thus uncertain and, combined with continued instability, is reflecting unfavorably upon both the import and export trade."

John Brisben Walker, writing in the New York Times, says:

"The effect on India and China will never be known in its fullest horror. The immediate depreciation of the only stock of money—silver—stopped trade and starved whole provinces. It caused millions of deaths."

H. H. Stevens, former Secretary of the Treasury of the Dominion of Canada, now Minister of Trade and Commerce, in an address to the Canadian Legislature:

"One billion people in the Orient, in China, in India, in the Malay States, and in Mexico are deprived of two-thirds of their purchasing power by the action of the nations. There is one reason for the agricultural and commercial depression which exists to-day all over the world. One-half of the human race is living below the margin of decent living. In fact, millions upon millions in China during the present year have died largely because of the inadequacy of their purchasing power."

J. F. Darling, director of the Midland Bank of London, in an address before the Royal Empire Society of London:

"Gold has been accorded a value more than sixty times that of silver to-day, despite the fact that the relative production of the two metals has been what it now is for the last four or five centuries. Over that long period only 14 ounces of silver have been produced for each ounce of gold. That proportion has shown no change for the last five years, but in the same length of time the price of silver has fallen from 64 to 28 cents an ounce.

"This has been terrific in its effect on the purchasing power of a billion people in the world which in return reacts against another billion. * * * We are fools to put up with it. Common justice, common humanity, and common sense urgently demand that the British Empire take the lead in restoring the equilibrium of gold and silver on which the economic structure of the world rests."

E. Kann, international authority on the currencies and finances of China:

"The sale by governments had a doubly harmful consequence. First, because extra quantities of silver were thrown on the market, irrespective of whether, when, or where these were wanted; and, second, the baneful psychological effect caused by the uncertainty, or rather the certainty, of more coming in the near future. This has been a huge black cloud overshadowing the silver market like an angel of death."

Mr. Chunilal Mehta, of India, addressing the annual meeting of the Bombay Bullion Exchange in January, 1931, said:

"But more important than the 'Rex' scheme for the rehabilitation of silver is the giving up by the Government of India of their policy of silver sales * * *. The Government of India has sold until now approximately 87,000,000 ounces of silver, * * * and it seems that the government policy is not yet revised. These sales of silver by the Government of India and the world knowledge that a further large amount is for sale have depressed the world market to the present low level."

Most of these statements were made practically two years ago. Since that time silver continued to fall rapidly until it reached a price as low as 25½ cents an ounce. It has been below 30 cents an ounce for months. Since these statements were made commodity prices in the United States and other gold-standard countries have followed silver in the downward course, notwithstanding the enactment of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act and the Glass-Steagall Banking Act. Since those statements were made unemployment in the United States has steadily increased and is now increasing. Since those statements were made our export trade has been steadily decreasing. Our domestic market has followed our export market in its collapse.

We are told that we have overproduction, yet we know that our people are suffering from underconsumption. We know that we have a surplus in this country, and that we always will have a surplus until we open our foreign markets for such surplus. We know that we can never have a profitable domestic market, that is, that commodity prices can never rise above the cost of production until we move our surplus out of the United States.

What is the Government doing toward the restoration of our export trade? The United States Senate adopted a resolution that I introduced over a year ago, requesting the President to take the leadership in the matter of calling a conference for the purpose of removing the causes that are depressing the price of silver and thus increasing our export trade to silver-money-using countries. No conference has been called and probably will not be for some time to come if the present attitude is maintained.

Sir George Shuster, treasurer of India, in refusing to cease the practice of melting up silver coins and of adding to the supply of silver in the world, has challenged the producers of silver to reduce their production. This can not be accomplished in the United States because 75 per cent of our silver production is as a by-product of the mining of other metals. These metals will always be mined when there is a market for them.

We can partially accomplish this demand on the part of Sir George Shuster by taking our production of silver off the market for a period of time under the provisions of the bill that we are discussing.

You contend that there is no more reason why our Government should purchase silver produced in the United States than that we should purchase any other commodity. It is painful for me to reiterate my argument that silver is no more of a commodity than gold and that it is money to over half of the people of the world to whom we desire to sell, and their only money. If the purchase of American silver even with gold—and I do not ask to have it purchased with gold—would restore our export trade with silver money using countries, we would profit by buying the silver if we dumped it in the ocean.

At the present time we could buy the annual production of silver in the United States for $10,000,000. If we limit the purchase to six years, it would only be a small fraction of what we have wasted through the Farm Board; but I do not propose that we shall buy the silver of the United States with gold. I propose that we shall buy it with silver certificates, or certificates of deposit, as they might be termed. It will cost the Government nothing. The issuance of these certificates is too insignificant to even be termed "inflation." We issued over $500,000,000 worth of silver certificates in this country at a time when we had only $1,000,000,030 gold reserve. To-day we have nearly $5,000,000,000 of gold reserves. The $500,000,000 worth of silver certificates that have been in circulation for 40 years or more have not threatened our gold standard nor constituted an inflation. They constitute one of our most practical forms of currency. They are rarely ever surrendered to the Treasury Department for redemption in silver dollars.

Certainly if the purchase clause of the act was limited to six years, you could have no objection. Your argument in such event that maintaining parity might eventually be burdensome must in such a case fail. I have proposed such an amendment to the subcommittee of the Committee on Banking and Currency of the United States Senate.

I have further proposed another amendment, and that is that purchases shall not have to be made at a price in excess of 10 cents an ounce above the average price for the three preceding calendar months. This certainly will prevent any sudden or unusual rise that may affect exchange.

You further object in your letter to the issuance of the infinitesimal amount of silver certificates on the grounds that no further circulating currency in this country is needed. You evidently include in the words "circulating currency" money that is in the banks. That money at the present time is frozen as tightly as the eternal ice of the North Pole. What we are interested in is circulating medium in the hands of the purchasers of this country.

You refer to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act and the Glass-Steagall Banking Act. The first act was never intended as anything except an increase in the reserve of banks and corporations to prevent failures and receiverships. That is all that it has done and that only to a limited extent.

It was hoped by its authors that the Glass-Steagall Banking Act would induce the banks to borrow from the Federal reserve banks currency to the extent of billions of dollars and circulate it through loans to the people of the country. This desire has not been accomplished. The banks have not availed themselves of the act. No one can blame them. The officers of any bank that would lend money upon any industry that could not pay a profit would be criminally negligent. Any man or corporation that would borrow money and pay interest thereon, who could not earn a profit on it, would be irresponsible. No one can make a profit on industry at present commodity prices. Everyone engaged in industry has more money invested now than he can earn a profit on. Industry could not borrow and banks could not lend. For such reasons the Glass-Steagall Banking Act to date has proven almost useless.

If the Government does not desire to have Federal reserve banks and member banks utilize silver certificates as lawful reserve, then that provision may be stricken from the bill.

I hope that, in view of the amendments that I have offered to make and am willing to make, you will not attempt further to oppose the enactment of such legislation.

With expressions of respect, I am,

Sincerely,

KEY PITTMAN.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, June 9, 1932.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Receipt is acknowledged of your letter of May 9, 1932, with further reference to S. 3606, "to authorize the purchase by the Government of American-produced silver, to provide for the issuance of silver certificates in payment therefor, to provide for the coinage of such silver, and for other purposes."

Although the proposed amendments to this bill by which Government purchases of silver under its provisions would be limited to a period of six years and to prices not in excess of 10 cents an ounce above the average price for the preceding three months constitute an improvement, the bill would, in my judgment, still be subject to the objections that the proposed operations would prove ineffectual in accomplishing the objects sought by the bill and are not in the interest of the country as a whole.

The conflict between our respective views on this general subject seems to me to be due in no small measure to the fact that much of your argument rests primarily on the assumption that the decline in the price of silver has been an important cause of the contraction in the volume of international trade, and consequently has been an important factor operating to produce and prolong the depression. In my opinion the decline in the price of silver has been primarily a result and not a cause of the depression. This is true even as regards conditions in the Orient. Although admittedly the foreign trade of a silver-standard country is temporarily disturbed during periods of marked change in the value of silver, adjustments to the new value of silver in terms of gold are relatively soon accomplished and the major continuing influences which determine the state of the country's national trade are those conditions which affect the quantity and value of the materials and services which it has to offer in foreign markets. Shrinkage in the foreign trade of China as in that of every other nation during this period of depression has accompanied declines in commodity prices in general, contraction of markets, and decrease in production and trade. Conditions of world depression have affected the markets for silver as they have affected the markets for practically all other commodities.

In this connection, it is interesting to note that despite the temporary obstacle to China's foreign trade which inevitably resulted from the marked decline in the value of silver, adjustments to the new level have apparently been accomplished fairly rapidly although admittedly not without loss and suffering. For instance, while our total exports showed a decline of about 54 per cent between 1929 and 1931, our exports to China declined by less than 27 per cent, and as between the first two months of 1931 and these same months of 1932 our total exports showed a decline of about 36 per cent, while exports to China actually increased by about one-fifth.

As stated in my previous letter, the rapid decline in silver prices to record low levels is to be accounted for chiefly by (1) conditions of world-wide depression accompanied by declines in commodity prices, accentuated in the case of the leading silver markets by seriously disturbed political and social conditions in the Orient; (2) the sale of silver by governments, more particularly the Indian Government; (3) the effect of the large silver holdings of the Indian Government, which overhang the market as a potential increase in the supply of silver, indicated by the prevailing low prices for the metal and already burdensome to the silver market in view of existing conditions of demand; and (4) the maintenance of production at relatively high levels.

In view of the magnitude of the factors which seem to account for the present low level of silver, the withholding from the market of the new silver produced in this country over a period of six years would not be likely to affect basic conditions in the silver markets materially. In my opinion there is little to be gained under present conditions from attempts to lift the prices of individual commodities by artificial means. The experiences of the past years in such attempts have not been particularly successful. Certainly the purchase and withholding from the market of our annual production of silver would not seem to be a very effective instrumentality through which to attempt to revive our foreign trade by means of price manipulation.

Another important point of divergence in our respective views relates to your position that it is inaccurate to consider silver as a commodity. I can not agree with your statement that silver is money for over half the people of the world to whom we desire to sell, and their only money. China is the only country representing any very considerable proportion of the world's population which is actually on a silver standard, and the proportion of China's population to that of the rest of the world exaggerates the importance of China's trade in the aggregate international commerce of the world. Furthermore, as I have already intimated, China's interest is not in a higher price for silver but rather in stable silver.

Clearly your proposal involves two conflicting interests: On the one hand that of the silver industry, which is in higher silver prices; and on the other that of the silver-using countries, which is primarily in stable prices for silver. As to the first, I should, of course, be glad to see improvement in the silver industry, as in all of our industries, operating as they are under conditions of severe depression. I should be loath, however, to single out the silver industry and to extend to it a special Government subsidy involving currency operations which are at best unnecessary and without advantage. To argue that such a subsidy would restore our foreign trade is to overlook the major causes which have brought about the decline.

As regards the interest of such countries as China, I believe that their chief interest, as well as that of any other nations, is in the reestablishment of improved economic conditions generally, as a result of which markets for commodities will be rehabilitated and profitable production on an increased scale will be possible.

Declining silver prices have doubtless exerted a temporary influence favorable to China's export trade and unfavorable to her import trade. Increasing silver prices might be expected temporarily to reverse these effects. In both cases, however, the net result of dislocation in her national economy on account of adjustments to fluctuating exchanges would seem to be adverse.

In conclusion, I wish to emphasize again my belief that the currency feature of your proposal is entirely unnecessary and undesirable. Through the operation of the Federal reserve system adequate provision has been made for the country's currency requirements, and if silver were to be purchased by the Government there would be no need whatever for providing additional currency facilities to accommodate such increase in the demand for currency as theoretically or actually might result from such operations. The artificial character of Government purchases of silver would not be lessened by the effecting of such purchases through the issuance of silver certificates. From the point of view of our monetary and banking system, this issue, even though restricted in amount, would be undesirable and unnecessary.

Very truly yours,

OGDEN L. MILLS,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. KEY PITTMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, June 17, 1932.

Hon. OGDEN L. MILLS,
The Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of June 9, 1932, in reply to my letter of May 9, with reference to S. 3606, "to authorize the purchase by the Government of American-produced silver, to provide for the issuance of silver certificates in payment therefor, to provide for the coinage of such silver, and for other purposes."

This correspondence between us, inaugurated by my letter of March 8 addressed to you, has clearly defined the issues between us, and has defined not only the scope and purpose of the act, but has served as a complete discussion of the entire silver-money problem.

In your letter, which I am now answering, you contend that the decline in the price of silver has not been an important cause of the contraction of the volume of international trade. You further contend that the decline in the price of silver has been primarily the result and not the cause of depression. You state that this is true with regard to conditions in the Orient.

In my letter to you under date of May 9 I cited published statements by well-known statesmen, economists, financiers, and business men throughout the world expressing opinions diametrically opposed to those held by you.

The first witness to testify before my subcommittee of the Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate dealing with our commercial relations with China was Dr. Julius Klein, Assistant Secretary of Commerce, and formerly in charge of our Far Eastern commercial matters. Doctor Klein, on June 26, 1930, in dealing with the effect upon our export trade with China of the depreciation in the value of silver, says:

"China, being on a silver basis, receives all of her income in China in silver, and all she receives from abroad must be paid for in silver, but upon a gold valuation. From our Table II we note that the average dollar value of the Shanghai tael in 1928 was 64.30 gold cents; in 1929, 58.42 cents; in May, 1930, 44.69 cents; and July 22, 1930, 36.74 cents. A simple way to state the problem is the obvious one that, other things being equal, China can not buy as much goods from abroad for 36 cents as it could for 64 cents."

Let me quote a later opinion of our Department of Commerce. I am quoting from the statistics of our trade with China, as found at page 504 of the Commerce Yearbook for 1931, volume 2, entitled "Foreign Commerce." The report says:

"As in all other parts of China, heavy declines in silver exchange reduced purchasing power and curtailed imports."

In reply to your opinion that the decline in the price of silver has been primarily a result and not the cause of the depression, let me call your attention to the statement of Doctor Klein which I have hereinbefore quoted. His statement discloses that the price of silver commenced to fall rapidly in 1928, and that in 1929 the price was approximately 15 per cent below what it was in 1928.

Commodity prices with the exception of probably agricultural products were not falling during that period of time. The decline in the price of silver preceded the decline in the price of commodities. I believe that you will find that in nearly every case the decline in the price of silver has preceded the decline in the price of commodities.

You compare the decline in our export trade to China with the decline in our export trade to gold-standard countries for the purpose of sustaining your argument that the decline in the price of silver was not responsible to any great extent for the depression in our exports to China. I have before me tables prepared by the Department of Commerce relative to our exports to and imports from China for the years 1928, 1929, 1930, and 1931. Our exports to China during such years are as follows:

1929	155,571,000
1930	112,776,000
1931	114,445,000

In 1928 the average price of silver was 58.48 cents an ounce. In 1930 the average price was 38.46 cents an ounce. During 1931 the price remained comparatively steady around 30 cents an ounce.

To study therefore the coincidence of the fall in the price of silver with the depression in our exports to China we must take the years 1928 and 1930. We find that during that period of time the price of silver declined approximately 34 per cent. The table that I have quoted from, above set out, discloses that during the same period of time our exports to China declined approximately 32 per cent.

Our exports to China did not decline in 1931 below 1930 for two reasons. In the first place, there was no substantial decline in the price of silver. In the second place, our exports of raw cotton and tobacco increased materially by reason of the great enlargement in China of plants for the manufacture of cotton goods and cigarettes.

This development was similar to the developments in Europe, but from different causes, however. The establishment of manufacturing industries in Europe by our own industrialists was due to the high tariff walls erected or proposed to be erected by European countries against our exports. In the case of China it was due to the low-exchange value of their silver money with our gold-standard money. It is true that the Chinese tariff added to the difficulties of the exchange situation.

Let me illustrate the argument I am presenting. Take raw cotton for instance: In 1928 we exported to China $17,743,000 worth of cotton; in 1931, $37,748,000 worth of cotton. That would seem to indicate that our cotton planter had profited by the situation. That is not true, however.

Let us consider our exports of raw cotton to the United Kingdom during the same period of time. In 1928 its value was $198,068,000; in 1930 it was $94,288,000. Our exports of raw cotton to England declined because, as stated in the report of the British Economic Mission to the Far East, Great Britain's exports of cotton piece goods to China fell off from 210,000,000 linear yards in 1929 to 64,000,000 linear yards in 1930. I have quoted in a former letter to you from the report of this economic mission showing that this falling off in exports is attributable by the mission to the low price of silver.

Now, whilst the export of raw cotton has increased and the export of tobacco has been maintained for the reasons I have stated, let us examine the statistics of the Department of Commerce to see how other products have been affected. Take wheat for instance: In 1929 our exports to China of flour were $15,490,000; in 1931 they were $6,467,000. Take iron and steel products: In 1929 they were $7,143,000; in 1931 they were $3,386,000. Take Douglas fir: In 1929, $4,252,000; in 1931, $2,399,000. Automotive products: 1929, $4,619,000; 1931, $1,896,000. Canned milk: 1929, $1,463,000; 1931, $870,000. Petroleum products: 1929, $26,195,000; 1931, $12,027,000.

I know that you will give weight to and be pleased to receive the opinion of the British Economic Mission to the Far East, which filed its report in 1931. This commission was headed by Sir Ernest Thompson, J. P. (chairman), and was composed of distinguished economists and commercial experts. Six months were devoted to this economic study. The report is searching and complete. I herewith set forth the entire statement under the subhead "The Silver Question":

"There exists in China to-day one outstanding problem which faces all nations desirous of selling their goods in the China market. The deplorably low silver values, and the consequently much reduced buying of the vast populace, are factors contributing to restrict the increase of imports into China from foreign countries. Finding it increasingly difficult to buy (for payment in gold) goods from abroad, China will be driven to discover ways and means of producing her own requirements. Should she continue to remain on a greatly depreciated silver basis, for some years, it is obvious that she will of necessity not only quickly enlarge her industrial capacity and manufacture goods now made in foreign countries, but will be able to export many of such goods to markets abroad now being served by Great Britain. The potentiality of China with her cheap labor, low standard of living, and depreciated currency is too obvious to require special emphasis. Once a country is driven in on her own resources there arises the possibility of a market being permanently lost. The first and foremost problem for Great Britain is that of supplying China with manufactured goods but it does not stand alone. Any falling off in trade automatically brings about a corresponding reduction in the income of British ships from freight, and concurrently, a reduction in insurance premia payable to British companies.

"Consideration of China's currency problem in another direction seems desirable. With every move downwards in silver values

China has to bear increasing financial burdens arising from the payment in gold of interest on foreign loans. She has to meet these obligations by imposing new duties which in their turn further restrict imports. China's funded debt due to foreign countries in principal and interest on January 1, 1931, stood at £202,000,000. In addition, there is a considerable floating debt. A very large portion of these obligations is due to British subjects and institutions. If silver falls still lower or even remains at its present level, payment of interest on foreign loans might be affected, much damage to British interests being caused.

"Certain proposed remedies for the decline in the value of silver do not meet China's case. Financial silver-producing interests in their alleged efforts to aid would load her further with this commodity. Such loading would undoubtedly give a momentary fillip to silver prices, and bring relief and joy to silver-producing groups, but has neither virtue nor merit in solving China's currency problem. There is no lack of silver in China. The lack is one of stability in its value.

"Suggestions have been made that the money powers of the world should call a conference with a view to the stabilization of silver at a fixed and definite ratio to gold, and this suggestion should receive the most serious consideration of those nations which trade with China and those which produce or have silver.

"The governor of the Bank of China is in touch with the International Chamber of Commerce. He has called the international chamber's attention to the serious handicap imposed on China's external trade by the continued depreciation of silver, and has stated that the plans for the consolidation of Chinese foreign debts have been considerably disturbed thereby. He asks for an early international conference to consider the question. The response to this request has been favorable, and as a preliminary the executive committees of the International Chamber of Commerce adopted a resolution calling on all national committees and members to urge their governments to take the silver problem into their early consideration in consultation with other governments, including the Chinese Government.

"Great Britain has so large an interest in China's trade that we trust she may be among the foremost to take action with a view to ascertaining what can be done by international agreement to raise the value of silver. We should be among the first to endeavor to arrive at an international understanding for reestablishing silver as a standard basis of credit. The flow of gold to America and France and the sales of silver by India are all factors in a serious situation. The probable shortage of gold in the near future and the overproduction of silver at the present time have raised issues that can not be ignored. There would appear to be no relief from present world conditions unless and until the fundamental matter of currency receives consideration. Upon some solution of this problem hangs the future of international commerce."

As I have stated before, on February 20, 1931, the Senate of the United States unanimously passed a resolution presented by me requesting the President to call or obtain an international conference for the purpose of meeting by agreement the very destructive conditions referred to in the report of the commission just quoted.

Despairing of obtaining action on this matter, I introduced the bill that has been under discussion. Its enforcement would tend to reduce the overproduction, or, more accurately stated, oversupply of world silver. It would tend to meet an emergency such as suggested by the British report until intergovernmental action could be taken. It is in the interest of our commerce and trade. It is only incidentally in the interest of the producer. It neither proposes nor does it give any bonus to the producer. He is paid exactly the same price for his silver with silver certificates that he could obtain in gold in the world market. It is no price-fixing scheme. It is not at all analogous to the purchase of wheat and cotton by the Farm Board. This board had no use for the wheat and cotton it purchased. Our Government has use for the silver and the currency that would be based upon it.

Apparently we can never agree to your theory that silver is a commodity only and nothing else. You state that only one country is really on the silver-standard basis and that is China. I say to you that only two countries are on the gold-standard basis, and those are the United States and France, and the United States alone is on the free gold standard basis.

The British commission has expressed it correctly. It is immaterial what the standard is. The question is what money does the ultimate buyer pay in and what is the value of that money in relation to gold standard money. I again repeat that over half of the people of the world have nothing to purchase with except silver money, and to-day we value that money in exchange for our gold standard money with which to purchase our goods at only 23 cents on the dollar.

You say you can not see that the bill will do much to accomplish the ends that I have in view. I will admit that it will not accomplish as much as is required; but if we can not even get action on this legislation over the opposition of the administration, how can we hope to attempt any fuller accomplishment?

I am advised that a majority of the Committee on Banking and Currency have at all times been in favor of the bill we have been discussing. I am satisfied that your opposition has deterred action on this bill. I hope that you will not only withdraw this opposition but that you will aid us in getting action on the bill.

Sincerely,

KEY PITTMAN.

THE BILL REFERRED TO

A bill to authorize the purchase by the Government of silver produced in the United States, to provide for the issuance of silver certificates in payment therefor, to provide for the coinage of such silver, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That silver bullion, the product of mines situated in the United States and of reduction works so located, may be deposited at any United States mint for sale to the United States at any time prior to July 1, 1938; and the Director of the Mint is directed to purchase silver so tendered, not in excess of 5,000,000 ounces per month, at the market price of silver in the United States as of the date of tender, if such market price of silver at such date is not in excess of 10 cents an ounce above the average market price of silver for the three preceding calendar months. The Director of the Mint shall continue to obtain and keep the necessary statistics to determine the price of silver for the purposes of this act, and shall publish the same at least every 30 days, and shall deliver such statement of prices to any person, firm, or corporation tendering silver for purchase by the United States Government under this act.

SEC. 2. The silver bullion purchased under the provisions of this act shall be subject to the requirements of existing law and the regulations of the mint service governing the methods of determining the amount of pure silver contained and the amount of the charges or deductions, if any, to be made; but such silver bullion shall not be counted as part of the silver bullion authorized or required to be purchased and coined under the provisions of existing law.

SEC. 3. Payment for silver bullion purchased under the provisions of this act shall be made in silver certificates, which shall be issued for that purpose in denominations of $10, $5, and $1; and there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, so much as may be necessary for carrying out the foregoing provisions of this act. Silver certificates so issued, and silver certificates heretofore issued, or any silver certificates reissued, shall be legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, except where otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract, and shall be receivable for customs, taxes, and all public dues. Such certificates, when held by any national-banking association or Federal reserve bank, may be counted as a part of its lawful reserve.

SEC. 4. The silver bullion purchased under the provisions of this act shall be coined into standard silver dollars and subsidiary silver coins sufficient, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, to meet any demands for redemption of silver certificates issued under the provisions of this act, and such coin shall be retained in the Treasury for the payment of such certificates on demand. The bullion so purchased and obtained under this act, except so much thereof as is coined under the provisions of this act, shall be held in the Treasury for the sole purpose of the redemption of the certificates issued hereunder and in the manner herein provided. Any such certificates or reissued certificates, when presented at the Treasury, shall be redeemed in standard silver dollars, or in subsidiary silver coin, at the option of the holder of the certificates: Provided, That, in the redemption of such silver certificates issued under this act, not to exceed one-third of the coin required for such redemption shall be made in subsidiary coins, the balance to be made in standard silver dollars.

SEC. 5. When any silver certificates issued under the provisions of this act are redeemed or received into the Treasury from any source whatsoever, and belong to the United States, they shall not be retired, canceled, or destroyed, but shall be reissued and paid out again and kept in circulation; but nothing herein shall prohibit the cancellation and destruction of mutilated certificates and the issue of other certificates of like denomination in their stead, as provided by law.

SEC. 6. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to make rules and regulations for carrying out the provisions of this act.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

TREATY BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND ITALY

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider Executive C, Seventy-second Congress, first session, a treaty between the United States and Italy, signed on September 23, 1931, abrogating article 2 of the treaty between the two countries, to advance the cause of general peace, signed on May 5, 1914, and substituting therefor new provisions in respect of the appointment of members of the international commission provided for in that article, which was read, as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

To the end that I may receive the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, I transmit herewith a treaty between the United States and Italy, signed on September 23, 1931, abrogating article 2 of the treaty between the two countries, to advance the cause of general peace, signed on May 5, 1914, and substituting therefor new provisions in respect of the appointment of members of the international commission provided for in that article.

HERBERT HOOVER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 3, 1932.

THE PRESIDENT:

The undersigned, the Secretary of State, has the honor to lay before the President, with a view to its transmission to the Senate to receive the advice and consent of that body to ratification, if his judgment approve thereof, a treaty between the United States and Italy, signed at Washington on September 23, 1931, abrogating article 2 of the treaty to advance the cause of general peace, signed between the two countries on May 5, 1914, and substituting therefor new provisions in respect of the appointment of members of the international commission provided for in that article.

By article 2 of the treaty of 1914, each Government appointed two members of the commission, one a national and the other a nonnational, and designated the fifth member in common agreement. The treaty now submitted provides for the appointment by each Government of but one member, who shall be a national of the appointing country, and the designation by the two Governments in common agreement of the three other members who shall not be nationals of or domiciled in either country.

Article 2 of the treaty of 1914 further provided a term of four years for the members of the commission and limited the time in which the appointments should be made. Under the treaty now submitted, the term of office of the members of the commission will continue indefinitely, and no limitation is placed on the time within which they may be appointed.

Respectfully submitted.

HENRY L. STIMSON.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, February 2, 1932.

The President of the United States of America and His Majesty the King of Italy, being desirous of modifying the terms of Article II of the treaty to advance the cause of general peace between the United States of America and Italy, signed on May 5, 1914, with respect to the appointment of and other provisions relating to the members of the International Commission constituted in accordance with the provisions of that Article, have resolved to enter into a treaty for that purpose, and have appointed as their Plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States of America: Henry L. Stimson, Secretary of State of the United States of America; and

His Majesty the King of Italy: His Excellency Nobile Giacomo de Martino, Knight of Grand Cross, Senator of the Kingdom, Royal Ambassador at Washington;

Who, after having communicated to each other their respective full powers found to be in proper form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE 1

Article II of the treaty between the High Contracting Parties, signed on May 5, 1914, is hereby abrogated and the following provisions are substituted therefor:

The International Commission shall be composed of five members, as follows:

One member shall be appointed from each country by the Government thereof;

The other three members shall be designated by the two Governments by common agreement. The three members designated by common agreement shall not be nationals of either the United States of America or Italy, or domiciled within the territories of either country, or employed in the service of either Government. The two Governments shall, also, by common agreement, designate one of these three members to be President of the Commission.

At any time when there is no case pending before the Commission, either Government may revoke the appointment of the member who is its own national and may appoint his successor. Either Government may, moreover, at any time when there is no case pending before the Commission, revoke the designation of one or more of the members chosen by the two Governments in common agreement.

Vacancies occurring by revocation or in any other manner shall be filled as soon as possible in the manner of the original appointments. Revocation by either Government of the designation of a member chosen by the two Governments in common agreement shall not become effective except simultaneously with the designation of his successor. The term of office of the members of the Commission shall continue indefinitely.

When the members of the Commission are occupied in the examination of a question they shall receive a compensation which will be mutually agreed upon by the two Governments. Such compensation and also the other expenses of the Commission shall be paid by the two Governments in equal parts.

ARTICLE 2

The members of the International Commission at present in office under the provisions of Article II of the treaty of May 5, 1914, are continued in office in accordance with the provisions of the present treaty.

ARTICLE 3

The present treaty shall be ratified and the ratifications thereof shall be exchanged at Rome as soon as possible. It shall take effect on the day of the exchange of ratifications and shall remain in force during the term of the treaty concluded between the High Contracting Parties on May 5, 1914.

In faith whereof, the respective Plenipotentiaries have signed this treaty in duplicate, in the English and Italian languages, and have hereunto affixed their seals.

Done at Washington this twenty-third day of September in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and thirty-one.

HENRY L. STIMSON [SEAL]
G DE MARTINO [SEAL]

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it will be recalled that what was known as the Bryan treaties provided for a conciliation commission composed of five members. Under the old treaty each country named two members of the commission. One of the persons named was to be a national, the other of a neutral country. Those commissioners so named were to name the fifth member, and they constituted a commission of five.

This treaty is a proposal to change the method of naming the commission in this respect. Under the treaty each nation names a commissioner, and he is to be of the nationality of that nation. Then those commissioners agree upon the other three members, making three neutral members agreed upon by the nationals, instead of the old method where four were appointed and they agreed upon one.

There is one other change in the treaty, that it is made permanent; that is, until notice of abrogation is given, whereas under the old treaty it was to terminate of its own force in a fixed number of years.

Those are the sole purposes and effects of the treaty, to change the method of naming the commissioners and extending the life of the treaty.

The treaty was reported to the Senate without amendment, and the resolution of ratification was read, as follows:

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of Executive C, Seventy-second Congress, first session, a treaty signed on September 23, 1931, abrogating article 2 of the general peace treaty with Italy, signed May 5, 1914.

The resolution was agreed to, two-thirds of the Senators present voting in the affirmative.

TREATY RELATING TO MILITARY OBLITAGIONS

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the treaty (Ex. H, 72d Cong., 1st sess.), a protocol relating to military obligations in certain cases of double nationality which was adopted at The Hague Conference for the Codification of International Law, held in March-April, 1930. Done at The Hague on the 12th day of April, 1930, which was read, as follows:

PROTOCOL RELATING TO MILITARY OBLIGATIONS IN CERTAIN CASES OF DOUBLE NATIONALITY

The undersigned plenipotentiaries, on behalf of their respective Governments,

With a view to determining in certain cases the position as regards their military obligations of persons possessing two or more nationalities,

Have agreed as follows:

ARTICLE 1

A person possessing two or more nationalities who habitually resides in one of the countries whose nationality he possesses, and who is in fact most closely connected with that country, shall be exempt from all military obligations in the other country or countries.

This exemption may involve the loss of the nationality of the other country or countries.

ARTICLE 2

Without prejudice to the provisions of Article 1 of the present Protocol, if a person possesses the nationality of two or more States and, under the law of any one of such States, has the right, on attaining his majority, to renounce or decline the nationality of that State, he shall be exempt from military service in such State during his minority.

ARTICLE 3

A person who has lost the nationality of a State under the law of that State and has acquired another nationality, shall be exempt from military obligations in the State of which he has lost the nationality.

ARTICLE 4

The High Contracting Parties agree to apply the principles and rules contained in the preceding articles in their relations with each other, as from the date of the entry into force of the present Protocol.

The inclusion of the above-mentioned principles and rules in the said articles shall in no way be deemed to prejudice the question whether they do or do not already form part of international law.

It is understood that, in so far as any point is not covered by any of the provisions of the preceding articles, the existing principles and rules of international law shall remain in force.

ARTICLE 5

Nothing in the present Protocol shall effect the provisions of any treaty, convention or agreement in force between any of the High Contracting Parties relating to nationality or matters connected therewith.

ARTICLE 6

Any High Contracting Party may, when signing or ratifying the present Protocol or acceding thereto, append an express reservation excluding any one or more of the provisions of Articles 1 to 3 and 7.

The provisions thus excluded cannot be applied against the High Contracting Party who has made the reservation or relied on by that Party against any other High Contracting Party.

ARTICLE 7

If there should arise between the High Contracting Parties a dispute of any kind relating to the interpretation or application of the present Protocol and if such dispute cannot be satisfactorily settled by diplomacy, it shall be settled in accordance with any applicable agreements in force between the Parties providing for the settlement of international disputes.

In case there is no such agreement in force between the Parties, the dispute shall be referred to arbitration or judicial settlement, in accordance with the constitutional procedure of each of the Parties to the dispute. In the absence of agreement on the choice of another tribunal, the dispute shall be referred to the Permanent Court of International Justice, if all the Parties to the dispute are Parties to the Protocol of the 16th December, 1920, relating to the Statute of that Court, and if any of the Parties to the dispute is not a Party to the Protocol of the 16th December, 1920, the dispute shall be referred to an arbitral tribunal constituted in accordance with the Hague Convention of the 18th October, 1907, for the Pacific Settlement of International Conflicts.

ARTICLE 8

The present Protocol shall remain open until the 31st December, 1930, for signature on behalf of any Member of the League of Nations or of any non-Member State invited to the First Codification Conference or to which the Council of the League of Nations has communicated a copy of the Protocol for this purpose.

ARTICLE 9

The present Protocol is subject to ratification. Ratifications shall be deposited with the Secretariat of the League of Nations.

The Secretary-General shall give notice of the deposit of each ratification to the Members of the League of Nations and to the non-Member States mentioned in Article 8, indicating the date of its deposit.

ARTICLE 10

As from January 1st, 1931, any Member of the League of Nations and any non-Member State mentioned in Article 8 on whose behalf the Protocol has not been signed before that date may accede thereto.

Accession shall be effected by an instrument deposited with the Secretariat of the League of Nations. The Secretary-General of the League of Nations shall give notice of each accession to the Members of the League of Nations and to the non-Member States mentioned in Article 8, indicating the date of the deposit of the instrument.

ARTICLE 11

A procès-verbal shall be drawn up by the Secretary-General of the League of Nations as soon as ratifications or accessions on behalf of ten Members of the League of Nations or non-Member States have been deposited.

A certified copy of this procès-verbal shall be sent by the Secretary-General to each Member of the League of Nations and to each non-Member State mentioned in Article 8.

ARTICLE 12

The present Protocol shall enter into force on the 90th day after the date of the procès-verbal mentioned in Article 11 as regards all Members of the League of Nations or non-Member States on whose behalf ratifications or accessions have been deposited on the date of the procès-verbal.

As regards any Member of the League or non-Member State on whose behalf a ratification or accession is subsequently deposited, the Protocol shall enter into force on the 90th day after the date of the deposit of a ratification or accession on its behalf.

ARTICLE 13

As from January 1st, 1936, any Member of the League of Nations or any non-Member State in regard to which the present Protocol is then in force, may address to the Secretary-General of the League of Nations a request for the revision of any or all of the provisions of this Protocol. If such a request, after being communicated to the other members of the League and non-Member States in regard to which the Protocol is then in force, is supported within one year by at least nine of them, the Council of the League of Nations shall decide, after consultation with the Members of the League of Nations and the non-Member States mentioned in Article 8, whether a conference should be specially convoked for that purpose or whether such revision should be considered at the next conference for the codification of international law.

The High Contracting Parties agree, that, if the present Protocol is revised, the new Agreement may provide that upon its entry into force some or all of the provisions of the present Protocol shall be abrogated in respect of all of the Parties to the present Protocol.

ARTICLE 14

The present Protocol may be denounced.

Denunciation shall be effected by a notification in writing addressed to the Secretary-General of the League of Nations, who shall inform all Members of the League of Nations and the non-Member States mentioned in Article 8.

Each denunciation shall take effect one year after the receipt by the Secretary-General of the notification but only as regards the Member of the League or non-Member State on whose behalf it has been notified.

ARTICLE 15

1. Any High Contracting Party may, at the time of signature, ratification or accession, declare that, in accepting the present Protocol, he does not assume any obligations in respect of all or any of his colonies, protectorates, overseas territories or territories under suzerainty or mandate, or in respect of certain parts of the population of the said territories; and the present Protocol shall not apply to any territories or to the parts of their population named in such declaration.

2. Any High Contracting Party may give notice to the Secretary-General of the League of Nations at any time subsequently that he desires that the Protocol shall apply to all or any of his territories or to the parts of their population which have been made the subject of a declaration under the preceding paragraph, and the Protocol shall apply to all the territories or the parts of their population named in such notice six months after its receipt by the Secretary-General of the League of Nations.

For the Secretary General:

H. McK. WOOD,
Acting Legal Adviser of the Secretariat.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, this is a treaty designed to do away with the obligations of double nationality in the matter of military service. Perhaps as brief a statement as I could make of the treaty will be found in the statement made by Mr. Flournoy, the legal adviser of the State Department, which I read:

Mr. FLOURNOY. A brief statement of the substance of this treaty is found in the first three articles. Article 1 is the one in which the United States is principally interested, and especially with regard to persons born in the United States of alien parents. Such persons almost invariably possess not only the nationality of the United States acquired through birth in that country, but also a nationality of the country from which their parents come; so that they have double nationality. The object of this article is to enable such persons, when they have maintained a residence in one of the two countries and are principally attached to that country, in that way having practically made an election of the nationality of that country, to visit the other country for pleasure, business, or for any purpose, without being arrested and either compelled to perform military service or, as often happens, being imprisoned for failure to respond to a call for military service while still residing in the United States.

The question was asked him as to why this treaty was necessary. I was not aware, myself, that such practice was being indulged in by nations generally, but Mr. Flournoy advised me that there are a great many instances arising in which a party born in this country of foreign parents, having thereby a double nationality, in all probability, when going back to the country from which his parents came, is often forced into the military service. This treaty is designed to prevent that from being done.

The treaty was reported to the Senate without amendment, and the resolution of ratification was read, as follows:

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of Executive H, Seventy-second Congress, first session, a protocol relating to military obligations in certain cases of double nationality, signed at The Hague April 12, 1930.

The resolution was agreed to, two-thirds of the Senators present voting in the affirmative.

TREATY RELATING TO TRANSPORTATION OF ALCOHOLIC LIQUORS THROUGH CANAL ZONE

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the treaty (Executive I, 72d Cong., 1st sess.), a convention between the United States of America and the Republic of Panama, signed at Panama on March 14, 1932, which has the purpose of allowing and regulating the transit of alcoholic liquors through the Canal Zone where the exportation of such liquors from the Republic of Panama or the shipment of them between points in Panama is now interfered with by the application of the liquor laws of the United States in the Canal Zone, which was read, as follows:

The President of the United States of America and the President of the Republic of Panama desiring, in accordance with the provisions of Article V of the Convention between the United States of America and the Republic of Panama for the Prevention of Smuggling of Intoxicating Liquors, signed at Washington, June 6, 1924, to modify the said Convention by adding to it an article which shall regulate transit through the territory of the Canal Zone, referred to in Article VI of the Treaty signed at Washington, on November 18, 1903, with respect to the shipment of alcoholic liquors from one point in the Republic of Panama to another point in the Republic of Panama, have decided to conclude a convention for that purpose and have appointed as their plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States of America, Mr. Roy T. Davis, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Republic of Panama; and

The President of the Republic of Panama, His Excellency Enrique Geenzier, Secretary for Foreign Affairs;

Who, having communicated their full powers found in good and due form, have agreed as follows:

ARTICLE 1

No penalty or forfeiture under the laws of the United States of America shall be applicable or attach to alcoholic liquors or to vehicles or persons by reason of the carriage of such liquors when they are in transit under seal and certificate by Panamanian authority from the terminal ports of the Canal to the cities of Panama or Colon or from the cities of Panama or Colon to the terminal ports of the Canal when said liquors are intended for exportation, or between the cities of Panama or Colon and any other points of the Republic or between any two points of the territory of the Republic when in any of these cases the direct or natural means of communication is through Canal Zone territory and provided that such liquors remain under the said seals and certificates while they are passing through Canal Zone territory.

ARTICLE 2

Article 1 of the present convention shall be deemed to constitute an integral part of the convention of June 6, 1924, and as such shall be subject to the provisions of that convention regarding modification and termination.

If the substance of Article 1 of the present convention be incorporated in any treaty which may hereafter be concluded between the United States of America and the Republic of Panama, the present convention shall automatically lapse when such treaty shall come into force.

ARTICLE 3

The present convention shall be ratified by the High Contracting Parties in accordance with the requirements of the constitutions of the United States of America and the Republic of Panama, respectively, and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Panama as soon as possible. The convention shall enter into force on the date of the exchange of ratifications.

In witness whereof, the respective Plenipotentiaries have signed the present Convention in duplicate, in the English and Spanish languages, both of which shall be authentic, and have hereunto affixed their seals.

Done in the City of Panama this fourteenth day of March, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and thirty two.

[SEAL.] ROY T. DAVIS.
[SEAL.] ENRIQUE GEENZIER.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, this treaty relates to the transportation of alcoholic liquors across the Panama Canal Zone by citizens of Panama, such liquors being in bond in process of shipment.

At the present time it seems that a great many controversies arise between our country and Panama by reason of the shipment of liquor belonging to citizens of Panama across the Canal Zone. The treaty provides that such shipment may be made, the liquor being in bond, and that is the sole purpose of the treaty.

I will say that had this treaty come to our attention prior to the Chicago convention, I think it would have formed an ideal platform, putting the liquor question in bond over the election.

The treaty was reported to the Senate without amendment, and the resolution of ratification was read, as follows:

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of Executive I, Seventy-second Congress, first session, a treaty with Panama regulating the transit of alcoholic liquors through the Canal Zone, signed at Panama, March 14, 1932.

The resolution was agreed to, two-thirds of the Senators present voting in the affirmative.

NOTIFICATION TO PRESIDENT OF CERTAIN CONFIRMATIONS

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, on June 15 the Senate confirmed the nomination of Hon. David D. Ashworth to be United States attorney for the southern district of West Virginia and the nomination of Hon. Harry A. Weiss to be United States marshal for the northern district of West Virginia. The President has not been notified of the Senate's action because there have not been two executive sessions, as required by the rules, since the nominations were confirmed. In order to avoid further delay, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate order that the President be promptly notified that the nominations which I have mentioned have been confirmed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HEBERT in the chair). Is there objection?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, let me inquire if that situation would be cured by an executive session to-day.

Mr. NEELY. No; it is necessary for the Senate to hold two executive sessions and there has been none since June 15.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. McNARY. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no objection, the President will be notified of the confirmation of the nominations referred to.

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD—T. V. O'CONNOR

The legislative clerk read the nomination of T. V. O'Connor, of New York, to be a member of the United States Shipping Board.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, it is always a very unpleasant duty to object to the confirmation of any person whom the President sees fit to appoint, but in this case I think the Senate would be derelict in its duty in confirming a man so utterly unfitted for the performance of the duties of this high office as is Mr. O'Connor. Through a number of years he has appeared before our committee, and I doubt whether we have a more incompetent man performing any duties of like kind in the country.

One of the most flagrant things Mr. O'Connor and his associates on the board have done was the absolute loss of $22,000,000 through lending a trust fund in the Shipping Board to various shipping companies at a ruinous rate of interest. It is almost impossible to conceive that the president of any board intrusted with an enormous fund to be loaned out to shipping companies for the purpose of building ships would have entered into any such contract, and yet we find that the loss in interest rates alone amounts to at least $22,000,000. It is not necessary to read all the items, but I want to give some examples.

On July 10, 1931, the Dollar Steamship Line borrowed $5,287,500 at an interest rate of one-fourth of 1 per cent, and I want to give the excuses Mr. O'Connor offers. He offered two excuses, and the first one he offered I shall state; but first I want to read a provision found in the Jones-White Act:

All such loans shall bear interest at rates as follows, payable not less frequently than annually: During any period in which the vessel is operated exclusively in coastwise trade, or is inactive, the rate of interest shall be as fixed by the board, but not less than 5¼ per cent per annum. During any period in which the vessel is operated in foreign trade the rate shall be the lowest rate of yield (to the nearest one-eighth of 1 per cent) of any Government obligation bearing a date of issue subsequent to April 6, 1917 (except postal-savings bond), and outstanding at the time the loan is made by the board, as certified by the Secretary of the Treasury to the board upon its request. The board may prescribe rules for determining the amount of interest payable under the provisions of this paragraph.

They did not prescribe any rules. It will be seen that an exception is made in reference to postal funds which are borrowed at a rate, I believe, of not exceeding 2 per cent. It is shown in the act itself, as equivocal as it is, as involved as it is, apparently purposely involved, that they did not intend to go below 2 per cent at any rate because they specifically excepted those obligations of the Government. It appears that occasionally the Government has to accept bills at a discount of one-fourth or one-eighth or one-half of 1 per cent, depending on the value of call money at the time.

When the act was passed we were lending money at 4½ per cent, and it is shown by the debates in both the House and the Senate that the purpose of the act was to lend the shipping companies money at about the same rate of interest, probably one-eighth of 1 per cent more than the rate of interest at which the Government got the money.

The purpose of it was to make it about 3½ per cent, that being the amount the Government got, and that was the argument in both the Senate and the House at the time. Yet the chairman of the Shipping Board got certificates from the Secretary of the Treasury with these remarkable figures, one-fourth of 1 per cent; the next contract, with the Export Steamship Corporation, in 1931, at three-eighths of 1 per cent; the Oceanic Steamship Corporation, $5,850,000, at three-eighths of 1 per cent.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennesee yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. HOWELL. I would ask the able Senator for what period of time these loans were made.

Mr. McKELLAR. They were made for 20 years, and the difference between these rates on these several loans which I have enumerated on page 11715 of the RECORD of May 27, and what we should have received, amount to the enormous sum, in those 20 years, of $22,000,000. We are losing over a million dollars each year.

A man who is so incompetent as that should not be the chairman of the Shipping Board. By the way, I digress here long enough to give the first excuse Mr. O'Connor made for those remarkable rates. I happened to be examining him at the time, and he said, referring to me, "Senator, you caused all that." I said, "I caused all that?" He said, "Yes; you objected to an amendment to a bill which the board presented to the Congress to change that rate of interest."

Fortunately, the RECORD was just the other way. Fortunately, as the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD proved, the Shipping Board offered a bill over in the House and it passed the House without a word as to the change of rate, and when it got over to the Senate and before the Committee on Commerce my distinguished friend, the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], learned in some way of these indefensible rates and offered an amendment in the Senate to correct it by charging 3½ per cent, as it was his duty to do. The Shipping Board and Mr. O'Connor had nothing to do with it, but it was done in the Senate, after the bill had been passed in the House without the provision by the Senator from Michigan, who is present here this afternoon and will verify what I am now saying. That was Mr. O'Connor's first excuse.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator's chronology is entirely correct. I think perhaps it should be said that after I had brought this matter to the attention of the Shipping Board, thereupon the Shipping Board very readily expressed its willingness to have the situation corrected, which, in my judgment, the Shipping Board should have brought to the attention of the Congress, instead of Congress having to bring it to the attention of the Shipping Board.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, and I thank my friend for having called attention to it.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. Is it not proper also to state in this connection that the first certificate which came to the Shipping Board, fixing a rate of interest less than 3 per cent, came on March 31, 1930, and that this legislation was reported to the Senate within a very few days thereafter with the approval of the Shipping Board?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; the Senator is mistaken about that. It first came in the form of an amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], as I recall, about June 2. When confronted with those facts, the same chairman of the board said, "Well, you would not let our bill go through." It seems he had some other bill in which he was interested. I had introduced an amendment to which he was very much opposed, and he met me in the hall and wanted to talk about it, but I turned away from him and told him I did not engage in trading and trafficking in legislation. That was the most he said, and yet he said that these losses were experienced because of the delay between June 2, when the Senator from Michigan caught this monstrosity, and the following January when the rate was changed.

As a matter of fact, there were but two loans made between June and the following January, when the interest rates were changed, and those were made at 3 per cent, notwithstanding what Mr. O'Connor had said that the law obligated them to accept these ridiculous rates of interest. When asked why they accepted the particular rates of interest, he could not explain. He was asked, "You did not have to loan the money?" He said, "No." "Why did you lend the money on that day when you felt you had to follow this remarkable statute?" He said, "Well, we just did." They could have fixed any day when it went into effect, but instead of that they just fixed the day when the smallest rate of interest went into effect.

I asked this question in the course of the investigation: "Mr. O'Connor, how does it happen you loaned to some at one rate and to some at another rate?" I asked one other witness, "How did it happen you did not get the lower rate?" I found one was paying an interest rate of 1½ per cent, when favored corporations, like the Export Corporation, was getting it at one-fourth and three-eighths of 1 per cent. He said, "We were there trying to get it at the lower rate, but they did not lend it to us at that rate. We had to pay 1½ per cent." He felt greatly wronged because they were charging him 1½ per cent when they were lending to favored corporations at lower rates, and the Export Corporation seems to have been one of the favored, because they got the very lowest rate of interest.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I want to be sure of the situation as I recall it. I completely agree with the Senator's reminiscence that the interest arrangement was an utter outrage on the Treasury of the United States and was indefensible in any way, shape, or manner. So far as the Shipping Board was concerned, technically it was bound by the terms of the law to make all loans on the basis of the certificate furnished by the Treasury Department.

If this section of the law was as outrageous as the Senator and I both agree that it was, though it has since been corrected as the Senator has indicated, I think the primary responsibility was on the Treasury of the United States, even before it was upon the Shipping Board, to have checked against any such back door to the Treasury, and that primary responsibility rests upon the Treasury for neglecting to have notified Congress that the change should have been made, and that technically and constructively the Shipping Board was bound to make the loans on the basis of the Treasury certificates.

Mr. McKELLAR. I agree with the Senator that the Treasury Department was derelict in its duty. The first obligation was upon the head of the Shipping Board. He was the man primarily intrusted with this trust fund. He above all others was responsible for this ridiculously low rate of interest and this enormous loss of $22,000,000 to the American taxpayers in the loans that were made.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. HOWELL. I would like to ask the able Senator if the Shipping Board could have been compelled to make the loans?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; there was nothing in the world to compel them to do so.

Mr. HOWELL. It was in their discretion?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, yes; it was a matter in their discretion. They did not have to make the loan at all. They could have made it any day they pleased. They could have selected the day. If they wanted, in the interest of the Government, to have the loan made at 3½ or 3¾ or 3⅜ per cent under the Jones-White Act, that was reasonable enough. Everybody else was paying the same. They could have arranged when the interest rate went into effect and thus protected the Government in the matter. If Mr. O'Connor had been a faithful chairman of the board looking after the interests of the Government, he would have refused to make any loan except upon a reasonable rate of interest, as he had the right to do.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. I have no purpose and no desire to defend the rate of interest in some of these loans, but I do think it is fair to all concerned that the responsibility for them should be rightly placed. In my opinion the responsibility rests upon the Congress of the United States for the legislation. We wrote into that law the rule which should determine the rate of interest. Now, as a matter of fact, the first certificate from the Treasury Department to the Shipping Board calling for a rate of interest less than 3 per cent came on the 31st day of March, 1930. Within three weeks, certainly within less than a month thereafter, legislation was reported to this body changing that mandatory provision of law with respect to the rate of interest, fixing a minimum rate of interest at 3½ per cent, and that legislation rested in this Chamber for more than 10 months without enactment. If the responsibility is on anyone it is on the Congress of the United States and not upon the administrative officer.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, Mr. President, I have just stated to the Senate that there were but two loans made while the legislation was pending and neither one was made according to this act. If the position of the Senator from Maine is correct, then Mr. O'Connor violated the very law to which the Senator refers, because while that law was in force and while the other proposal was before the Congress for a greater rate of interest, Mr. O'Connor and his board let but two contracts and they charged 3 per cent without regard to their opinion about the law. So it makes no difference which horn of the dilemma Mr. O'Connor takes, if he is trying to hide behind this makeshift of an interest rate, he violated it because he made two loans at 3 per cent while that was going on.

When Mr. O'Connor found that none of those excuses could be availed of he offered another one. What was that one? It was that they had gotten an informal opinion from the Attorney General of the United States that the first law, this equivocal provision about interest, required him to accept the certificate of the Treasury Department and he could not get around it. Mr. President, I have that provision here. I do not know whether the Attorney General ever rendered that opinion or not. A paper purporting to be an opinion to somebody else, an informal opinion as it was called, not signed by anyone, was indeed brought forth.

But the board never followed that opinion, never paid any attention to that opinion, and under that opinion, even if they had followed it, they would not have agreed to any of these rates of interest because that opinion specifically states they did not have to do it, that they need not make the loans at all if they wanted to refuse to do so, that they could reject the loans as they pleased, and it was not necessary for them to make them. Instead of it being a defense, that opinion is an absolute conviction of those people for permitting this rate of interest. I asked this question:

> The amount of the loan to the Dollar Line was $5,280,500 and the rate of interest was one-fourth of 1 per cent. How did that happen?

Mr. O'Connor replied:

> It happened as a result of a decision passed by the Attorney General and by a certificate from the Treasury Department that that was the rate of interest that day, and we had to lend the money out at that rate.

I digress long enough to say that while the bill was pending here they disregarded it entirely. Mr. O'Connor disregarded it and let the money out at 3 per cent; he made a contract with them at 3 per cent. He had a right to make the contract at any other time he pleased. He had the right to fix the rate of interest before he ever entered into any kind of a contract.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I know the Senator wants to be entirely fair about it and our views are not very far apart. I have not examined my files, but my recollection is that I had one or two letters from the Shipping Board—I do not remember whether from Mr. O'Connor personally—during the pendency of my measure, urging that it be pressed because of the fact that certain loans were pending. I think that should be stated for the RECORD.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think that is true. I think after the board found that these remarkable rates of interest were known and were public property they undertook to hedge by asking for a so-called change in the law.

Let us go back now to the Attorney General's opinion. I said, "The Shipping Board was not compelled to loan money to any company." Mr. O'Connor assented that that was so. The responsibility of the Shipping Board for this interest rate is sufficiently shown in the comments at the end of a statement in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 27, 1932, at page 11372. The RECORD gives the whole matter, and shows that this man, who permitted this state of affairs, this raid upon the Treasury without authority of law, should not be confirmed.

The total amount of loans, made at interest rates ranging from one-fourth of 1 per cent to 3⅜ per cent, exceed $111,250,000.

Think of it—at rates of interest of one-fourth per cent, three-eighths per cent, one-half per cent, three-quarters per cent, five-eighths per cent, and 1 per cent we were lending money to shipping companies, and the Shipping Board was accepting these low rates of interest!

By the way, Mr. President, it is in accordance with the request of the Shipping Board, I understand, that a bill is now pending in the House of Representatives to declare a moratorium on these infinitesimal rates of interest, so that the shipping companies will not have to pay any interest for some time. I understand further—I do not know whether it is true—that the Shipping Board is seriously considering the question whether or not they themselves have not the right to extend such a moratorium. Yet we are asked to confirm the nomination of the man who was more responsible for it than anybody else, because he is the chairman of the Shipping Board.

Now let us see what the loss has been. The loss to the United States on interest account alone, for these loans, first, when compared with the 3½ per cent rate, prescribed as a minimum, will be over $18,000,000. In the next place, when compared with the amount the Government paid for the money—and the Government borrowed the money to lend to them—the loss will exceed $22,000,000. The interest rates on the loans were ¼ per cent, ⅜ per cent, ½ per cent, ⅞ per cent, 1 per cent, 1¼ per cent, 1½ per cent, 1⅞ per cent, and so forth. The record reveals the fact that the public officials concerned recognized that Congress never intended to allow the payment of such low rates, and that if these rates are legal the United States is the victim of complex language and highly technical rules controlling its application.

Again, as to the basis of such rates, it is claimed that the use of such low rates was due solely to the language of the law which I have quoted [reading]:

> During any period in which the vessel is operated in foreign trade the rate shall be the lowest rate of yield * * * of any Government obligation * * * outstanding at the time the loan is made by the board.

Let me now refer to departures from this test. Notwithstanding the explanation thus given, there appear in the list above, the following variations in the tests or rules applied: (a) Some loans, though made subsequent to the 1928 act entirely ignored this language of the law, and by its voluntary act expressly agreed on and fixed the rate of interest in the loan agreement, without certification of interest rate from the Secretary of the Treasury, and without respect to any test or "yield" (on whatever basis interpreted) prescribed in the law. At least as to five of the contracts there was a disregard of the statutory rate of interest.

Not only was the interest test prescribed in the law thus entirely ignored but the rate of interest thus voluntarily fixed by the board (not by accident or by oversight, but by formal resolution dealing specifically with the interest rate) was so low as the abnormal rate of one-half of 1 per cent per annum—and that for a period of 20 years! The average rate on the public debts of the United States is nearly eight times that rate.

Here was an official in charge of a sacred trust fund for building up the merchant marine of the United States lending the Government money at what? At one-eighth of the rate of interest that the Government had to pay for that money when it borrowed it, and it had to borrow it, and yet the Senate of the United States, the constitutional body that has to give its sanction to any appointment of this kind, is called upon to confirm the appointment of an official who participated in such transactions.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. My recollection is that some one member of the board at the time of my original disclosure was particularly and personally charged with the responsibility for the loan section of the board. Does the Senator have any information as to what commissioner that was? I am very sure it was not Mr. O'Connor.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know, but Mr. O'Connor was chairman of the board; and, of course, it was all done with his knowledge, approval, and consent; and, as shown by testimony before the Committee on Appropriations, he took the responsibility; he was familiar with every detail; he made excuses in every way; he did not say that there was any other member concerned about it, except as the board in general was concerned.

I wish to say that I think that not only should the Senate not confirm Mr. O'Connor but it ought not to confirm any member of the board who was responsible for this loss to the Government. In my judgment, they were unfaithful trustees.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator, and then I will not interrupt him again——

Mr. McKELLAR. I am delighted to have the Senator interrupt me whenever he wishes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That while I might not be impressed by his challenge of the administration of the law prior to its change by Congress, I am wondering whether or not the Government would not still be loaning money to shipping companies for almost nothing if I had not happened to stumble upon the circumstance or if some other Member of Congress had not happened to have stumbled upon it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am just as certain as that I am standing here talking this afternoon that the Shipping Board, under the leadership of Mr. O'Connor, would be lending to the shipping companies of the country money at this ridiculous rate of interest right now if the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] had not in some way—I do not know how, and I do not think he has explained how—as a member of the committee discovered the fact that these ridiculously low rates of interest were being charged and brought it to the attention of the country through his amendment. I know that the money would be loaned to-day just as it was then, and instead of $22,000,000 by this time we would probably have lost $100,000,000. Of course $100,000,000 does not mean much; our Budget has just been balanced; we know that putting a billion dollars' additional taxes on the American people does not mean very much, but just listen to how much it means to a shipping company such as one to which I have referred that is drawing a subsidy from the Government, a two-way subsidy, one involving money from this fund and another in the way of a mail subsidy.

The vice president of that company testified before our committee that the company was worth from $200,000,000 to $250,000,000; that it did not owe any bonded indebtedness; that it was paying dividends; that it was making money; that it was going on as usual; that it was discounting its bills; and yet the Government was lending it money at a fractional per cent interest, and in addition giving it over $1,200,000 as a bounty or subsidy, and, incidentally, that particular company flies more foreign flags than it flies American flags. That is what we are doing.

TAX ON GASOLINE AND LUBRICATING OIL

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. From the Committee on Finance I report House Joint Resolution 435, to amend the revenue act of 1932, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will ask the Senator if it will take any time?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I wish the Senator would not ask that the joint resolution be considered at this time.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say that if it is not passed to-day and made a law, then for every day thereafter there will be a loss on the tax imposed on gasoline under the recently passed tax law.

Mr. COPELAND. The Finance Committee is going to meet at 9 o'clock, as I understand, on Monday morning. I have had, and I think other Senators have had, protests from small dealers, and I think that before this matter is finally concluded by the Senate the Finance Committee should take into consideration the protests which have been entered against it.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say that the condition in regard to gasoline and lubricating oil is exactly the same as the condition concerning rubber tires and tubes, and the Government will get no tax revenue for some time unless the change is made as provided in the joint resolution. We want to make the tax payable by those who hold the gasoline, and they are the ones who ought to pay it. If the Senator desires to object, of course, that is all right; I am perfectly willing that he should do so.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. GORE. I will say to the Senator from New York that I understand the joint resolution exempts the small dealers.

Mr. SMOOT. It does.

Mr. GORE. Dealers having less than 25,000 gallons of gasoline are exempt.

Mr. SMOOT. It exempts every dealer having less than 25,000 gallons of gasoline and less than 1,000 gallons of lubricating oil. It protects every little dealer.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. One at a time. The Senator from Tennessee has the floor.

Mr. McKELLAR. I yielded to the Senator from Utah. I am perfectly willing to wait; I am a little tired now.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have asked unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I have not been able to find out what the proposition is. I can not tell whether or not I will object until I hear the measure read.

Mr. SMOOT. It involves exactly the same proposition as was before us in relation to rubber tires and tubes. In this case the tax will not apply to any holder who has less than 25,000 gallons of gasoline; but wherever it has been purchased or transferred by the big companies—and they transfer it by the millions of gallons—and is held by them, the tax will be applicable to them. Under the tax bill as it passed, there would be no tax paid at all.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I know nothing about it whatever, and I do not care anything about it; but when I receive telegrams from my State such as the brief one which I shall read, I feel that the matter deserves our attention. Here is a telegram dated to-day:

NEW YORK, N. Y., June 17, 1932.

Hon. ROYAL S. COPELAND,
Senator from New York, Senate Office Building:

This company is a New York corporation engaged in distributing gasoline from its terminal in Green Island, N. Y. It is not a producer or importer of gasoline under section 617 of the new tax law, but would be affected by proposed amendment taxing persons storing more than 25,000 gallons. This amendment is discriminatory in favor of the large oil companies for this reason. Large producing companies can always pass tax on to purchasers, whereas small independent companies who purchase cargoes in June, 1933, for distribution will pay tax to producers in that month and will be unable to collect the same from their customers in July, 1933. Proposed amendment thus results in equality and greatly favors large major oil companies. As New York citizens and taxpayers, we request you to oppose this amendment in the Senate. Its result is to burden the small independent distributors with 13 months of this taxation against the 12 months' duration intended by Congress and still operative in the case of the major companies who are producers as well as distributors.

HARTOL TERMINAL CORPORATION.

Mr. President, I have no disposition to delay this matter beyond the meeting of the Finance Committee on Monday. If at that time it is found that these small producers are taken care of, I have not a word to say; but for the present, Mr. President, I object.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask leave to withdraw the report, so that the joint resolution may go back to the Finance Committee.

Mr. McKELLAR. If it is going to take any more time, I will not yield any further.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry: Was objection made to the request of the Senator from Utah?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes; I made an objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood the Senator from New York to object to the request.

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD—T. V. O'CONNOR

The Senate, in executive session, resumed the consideration of the nomination of T. V. O'Connor, of New York, to be a member of the United States Shipping Board for a term of six years from June 9, 1932.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, to show how Mr. O'Connor and his board acted in reference to these contracts that were made, it is found that in some of the contracts that I have already enumerated the rate was determined by the coupon interest rate of the security, used as a test; that is, the rate of interest the obligation yielded on the basis of its initial sale by the United States, when issued; in other words, the rate paid by the Government. On the other hand, the board sometimes applied a rate, as in items 1, 2, 3, 4, 10, 12, 13, 18, and others, which rate was determined by the market price of the obligation used as a test, as of the day the loan was made, and as revealed in transactions between third persons, hence having no bearing whatever in determining or revealing the interest cost of that obligation to the United States.

In item 1, for instance, the "obligation" bore on its face and (as it was issued at par) actually cost the United States an interest rate of 3½ per cent, and yet it was certified in support of an interest rate of one-fourth of 1 per cent—at a time when the public debt of the United States was costing the Government nearly sixteen times that rate.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Would not that be a challenge to the Treasury, which issued the certificate, rather than to the board, which paid the money?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; but my heavens! The board, as trustee, had this $175,000,000, or $325,000,000 I believe it is now, in its hands. When an interest rate like that was certified to it, where was the counsel of the Shipping Board, the man that the American Government is paying $18,000 a year to pass upon these questions? It was the duty of the Shipping Board to present such a matter to its counsel; and, if it had done it, and if the counsel was worth one-third—nay, if he was worth one-sixth—of what we were paying him at the time, he would have advised the chairman of the Shipping Board against any such rate of interest. In other words, we were lending this money out at one-sixteenth of the rate of interest the Government was paying, in some instances!

Although the law used complex terms in prescribing an interest test, it made possible an application of the rule of reason by also providing, immediately following the complex language—section 301 (d):

> The board may prescribe rules for determining the amount of interest payable under the provisions of this paragraph.

Thus supplementing the control resulting from the fact that the grant of any loan was wholly discretionary. The board, however, did not exact any rule covering the point. It did not have to make any rule. It did not have to lend a dollar of this money unless the borrower complied with its terms.

Now, as to the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury; and I call the attention of the Senator from Michigan to this: The Secretary, believing that the rates certified were not in accord with the intent and policy of Congress, suggested that the board arrange the loans on the basis of a contract interest rate and thus obtain a reasonable and a substantially uniform rate of interest.

Mr. VANDENBERG. What was the date of this particular transaction?

Mr. McKELLAR. This was early, when the Shipping Board first made the application for a certificate. The Treasury Department—and, as I remember the testimony, Mr. Mellon—said that it was virtually inconceivable that this money should be lent on any such rate of interest as that. He certified the lowest rate of interest, but he did not pass upon whether it was proper to lend the money at that rate, except to say to the Shipping Board that it ought to be changed. That was in the early stages of the matter; and yet they introduced the bill in the House without saying a word about it; and if it had not been for the unusual and splendid services of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], it would not have been caught up with to this date.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is what I was getting at. This was before I submitted my proposal?

Mr. McKELLAR. That was before the Senator's proposal.

The board explains its abandonment of this suggestion by a legal opinion from the Attorney General, which on its face expressly mentions it is "informal." Assuming it had been a formal opinion, intended as a basis of final action——

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do.

Mr. DAVIS. I notice in the hearings before the Subcommittee on Appropriations of the United States Senate, on April 15, page 784, that the chairman of the United States Shipping Board sent to the Attorney General Senator VANDENBERG's letter; and then further, on page 787, on July 7, in response to a request of Secretary Mellon, Chairman O'Connor went to Secretary Mellon's office, and there they discussed the matter; and in that particular communication from the chairman to Commissioner Cone he said that the Secretary of the Treasury was very friendly to the increase in rates; and all through this hearing I find that Mr. O'Connor himself was anxious to increase the rate of interest.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no, Mr. President!

Mr. DAVIS. I do not think we should place all of that responsibility upon Mr. O'Connor, because it will be noticed at the bottom of page 787 that Mr. O'Connor said, in answer to a question of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]:

> This letter is addressed to the committee on construction loans, Commissioners Cone, Plummer, and Benton.

Those three commissioners were the committee on construction loans, and I hardly think it is fair that we should charge it all up to Mr. O'Connor.

Mr. McKELLAR. Well, if just one-third of it was charged to Mr. O'Connor—and, of course, he is chargeable with one-third—it would be ample to prevent his confirmation in this body, if we protect the interests of the Government.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. I have not got this quite clear in my mind. At what rate of interest did they loan money to the shipping companies?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will give that to the Senator again in just a moment. I do not think I went into the matter as thoroughly as I should. I will give it to the Senator.

There were a great number of these loans. Remember, there was $112,000,000 lent out. Of course, $112,000,000 is just a little money for the United States Government, notwithstanding the fact that we have not any in the Treasury, and notwithstanding the fact that we are three billions behind for this year alone. One hundred and twelve million dollars is not much, but that is what Mr. O'Connor paid out to the shipping companies at these rates of interest:

Dollar Steamship Line, $5,287,500 at one-quarter of 1 per cent. That line does not need any such largess as that. It does not need any such subsidy as that, and yet that is what was done.

The Export Steamship Corporation—Mr. George Herberman—$1,705,000 at three-eighths of 1 per cent.

The Oceanic Steamship Corporation, $5,850,000 at three-eighths of 1 per cent.

The Export Steamship Corporation—Mr. Herberman's company, again—$1,725,000. Why, he had to pay one-half of 1 per cent interest this time. If any Member of this body wanted to borrow money, he could not borrow it for less than 6 per cent, probably; but Mr. O'Connor, having unlimited funds of the American Government, acting as trustee, lent out this money to Mr. Herberman, of the Export Steamship Corporation, at one-half of 1 per cent for 20 years, if you please—20 years.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, the reason why I asked the Senator to repeat that was because of the fact that I thought he must be in error. I could not conceive that that was true.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is inconceivable, as the Secretary of the Treasury said; and I am going to read his statement in just a minute. The Senator from Pennsylvania called my attention to it, and I want to read it; but I want to get before the Senate these rates of interest and the great amount of these loans, and I am glad the Senator asked me that question.

I will read just a little further:

United States Lines, $7,875,000 at one-half of 1 per cent.

Again, United States Lines, $7,875,000 at one-half of 1 per cent.

Motor Tankship Corporation—that was not such a big corporation; it did not have so much influence—and this board actually charged it the enormous rate of seven-eighths of 1 per cent interest.

The Dollar Steamship Lines: Something must have happened to old man Dollar. He got the first $5,287,500 at one-quarter of 1 per cent; but a little later, on October 1, 1931, he got another $5,287,500, and had to pay the enormous rate of 1 per cent for 20 years.

The next one is a loan to the Export Steamship Corporation, Mr. Herberman, of $1,725,000 at 1¼ per cent.

New York & Puerto Rico Steamship Co., $1,896,000 at 1¼ per cent.

Export Steamship Corporation, $1,725,000 at 1½ per cent.

Motor Tankship Corporation, $1,260,900 at 1⅞ per cent.

Oceanic Steamship Co., $5,850,000 at 2 per cent. I think it was the Oceanic Steamship Co.'s vice president that I asked a question about this interest rate. When I found that he had to pay the enormous sum of 2 per cent interest on the money that he borrowed for 20 years I asked him where he was when the one-quarter of 1 per cent money was going around. He said he was standing in the door, but he could not get any of it; that he had to pay 2 per cent for his.

Now I come to the Tidewater Co. The Tidewater Associated Transportation Co. borrowed $1,301,000 at 2⅜ per cent.

The Motor Tankship Corporation, $1,260,900 at 2⅜ per cent.

The Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Lines, $3,262,500 at 2⅜ per cent.

The Bulk Transportation Co., $396,750 at 2⅜ per cent.

The Dollar Lines got a batch of only $225,000 at 2⅝ per cent, and they were actually compelled to pay it back in 15 years.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the Senator tell me what provision there is in the law, if any, that permits the Shipping Board to do that?

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator may not have been in the Chamber when I referred to the fact that the law provided that they should lend this money, up to the time of the passage of the Jones-White Act, which was May 22, 1928, at 4½ per cent. Heaven knows that was cheap enough. That was cheaper than anybody else was borrowing money for, except the Government, and the Government had to pay an average of a little less than 3½ per cent, about 3.39 per cent.

A bill was introduced, and it was said that the Government ought to favor these companies, that they were charging them too much, that we ought to let them have the money at the same rate the Government paid for it, so this remarkable interest provision was inserted in the Jones-White Act. I want to say that it is the most remarkable provision of law I ever saw on the statute books in my 21 years of experience. I will not characterize it; I will just read it, and let other Senators characterize it. I am just going to read the act, but it is like some other instruments I have seen, it would take a Philadelphia lawyer to construe it after I read it. But let every Senator pass on it as he will. Listen to it.

All such loans—

Mind you, the purpose was to bring it down to within one-eighth of a per cent of what the Government paid for money generally. It was argued on the floor of the House and it was argued on the floor of the Senate that it would mean a reduction of about 1 per cent, that it would bring the interest rate that these companies paid down to about 3½ per cent, and this is the way they propose to do it. Instead of saying that the rate of interest should be 3½ per cent, instead of finding out what the average rate of interest was, and applying that rate, they applied it in this way:

All such loans shall bear interest at rates as follows, payable not less frequently than annually: During any period in which the vessel is operated exclusively in coastwise trade, or is inactive, the rate of interest shall be as fixed by the board, but not less than 5¼ per cent per annum.

If a company was engaged in doing American business, the interest was 5¼ per cent, but if it was engaged in doing foreign business, this is the provision:

During any period in which the vessel is operated in foreign trade the rate shall be the lowest rate of yield (to the nearest one-eighth of 1 per cent) of any Government obligation bearing a date of issue subsequent to April 6, 1917 (except postal bonds)—

Everybody knows that postal bonds bear a 2 per cent rate, or about that. So it was shown that it should not be less than that, by the use of the words "postal bonds." I read further—and outstanding at the time the loan is made by the board, as certified by the Secretary of the Treasury to the board upon its request. The board may prescribe rules for determining the amount of interest payable under the provisions of this paragraph.

That is a very involved statement.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. The Senator spoke of this as being the most extraordinary piece of legislation he had ever seen. I can not help calling his attention to the fact that practically a year after this was written into the law the Senator voted for identically the same provision in the cooperative marketing act, by which the rates to be paid by farm cooperatives was fixed.

Mr. McKELLAR. That may be true. The farm marketing act was copied from this, I have no doubt, but that provision was never called specifically to my attention. I have no defense on that ground, for a man ought to know what is in a bill when he votes for it; but it was there, and when I voted for it I made a mistake about it. The farmers never got money at that rate. I think there were 11 insolvent cooperative associations in the country dealing in cotton, and they may have gotten it. They have been engaged in gambling on the cotton market in New York and in other places, spending the Government's money in the same way that the Shipping Board has been spending the Government's money, possibly in a little different way but almost as indefensible. It may have been that those associations got money at that rate, but no farmer in this land had the advantage of any such rate of interest. There was no farmer in this land who did not have to pay all the way from five to sixteen and perhaps eighteen times as much for any money he got. The associations, the favored associations, which the Government had set up to take over the cotton business—and I am speaking of cotton associations and cooperative cotton associations—may have gotten it, favored by the Government, just as these shipping companies were favored by the Government. They may have gotten it, but not a farmer in the United States ever got such a rate.

If what I have to say about it should ever be read by any farmer who ever got any such rate, I hope he will write

Members of the Senate and tell them; but I know that no farmer ever got such a rate as this.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. BLAINE. As I recall, when the marketing act was before the Senate it was I who offered the provision relating to the interest rate——

Mr. McKELLAR. I did not know that. I thank the Senator for calling my attention to it.

Mr. BLAINE. To make it correspond to the rate of interest charged under the jurisdiction of the Shipping Board. But after that provision had been written into the law, then they rigged up a situation by which they deprived the cooperatives of money at that low rate of interest.

Mr. McKELLAR. I understand some cooperative did get money at a small rate of interest. I imagine they were like the shipping companies favored by the Shipping Board. Some of them were favored, and some of them had an entrée into the administration of the Farm Board, and may have gotten money at the low price, but no man who toils with his hands and makes his living by the sweat of his brow, no farmer, ever got any such rate of interest from the cooperatives who loaned money to him.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator is correct in that, and, moreover, the money was not loaned to the cooperatives at the rate of interest to which they were entitled.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. In just a moment. Will the Senator from Wisconsin explain what rate of interest the cooperatives paid?

Mr. BLAINE. The cooperatives were charged a rate of interest according to the rules of the Stabilization Corporation, or some other organization that was set up and loaned the money to the cooperatives.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator recall what the rate of interest was? I had not investigated that feature of it. Does the Senator recall what the cooperatives paid?

Mr. BLAINE. They paid a very high rate of interest, with a very few exceptions, but I do not recall any cooperative that received rates of interest as low as those offered by the Shipping Board.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. As a matter of fact, under the operation of the farm marketing act, out of the revolving fund set up, there has been loaned to these cooperatives, roughly, $928,000,000, and the average rate of interest on those loans is 1.7 per cent, and the interest rate on some of the loans has been as low as one-eighth of 1 per cent. That is the fact about that.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if that is the fact about it, the cooperative associations, these 11 insolvent cooperative associations to which the Government loaned that enormous sum, have treated the farmers more outrageously than ever I thought they had done. That is the only way to describe it, because they have loaned money to the farmers at 5½ and 6 per cent, and sometimes even at higher rates than that, I am informed.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. I would like to ask the Senator from Maine if he places the construction upon this act to the effect that it permits the loaning of money to these shipping companies at one-eighth of 1 per cent?

Mr. WHITE. I thought I might say something about this, and I do not like to interrupt the Senator from Tennessee——

Mr. McKELLAR. I will ask the Senator not to make a speech, but I would be very glad to have him answer the question.

Mr. WHITE. I am bound, in truthfulness, to say that this provision of law has worked out differently from what I ever anticipated it would work out, but I do not hold responsible for these low rates of interest the administrative officers. I think the responsibility rests upon the Congress, for we wrote into the statute, not the rate of interest but the arbitrary rule by which the rate of interest should be determined. The rate of interest was different from what any of us anticipated, but I do not think that invalidates the law. It may impeach our judgment as legislators.

Mr. WHEELER rose.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, before I yield to the Senator from Montana, I want to say that the first answer to what the Senator from Maine has said is that the Congress is not responsible for it because it did not know anything about it; and the chances are a hundred to one that they never would have known anything about it if it had not been for the astuteness and the devotion to public duty of the distinguished junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], who caught up with it. It was never stated by the board to any Member of Congress until a Member of Congress happened to find it out; and then it was admitted that the rates of interest were indefensible, and excuses were being sought in every way.

The other answer to it was that the board did not carry out the law. They loaned to some companies at a quarter of a per cent, and three-eighths of a per cent, and half of a per cent; and they loaned to other companies during the same period, and especially between June, 1930, and January, 1931, they made loans, where the rate was fixed by contract, and they could have fixed the rate of every one of the loans by contract at 3 per cent because they had a right under the law to do so.

I now yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WHEELER. I am not quite clear in my own mind—and perhaps it is my own fault—as to how, even under the statement of the Senator from Maine, the board could lend money at one-eighth or one-quarter of a per cent.

Mr. McKELLAR. One-quarter of a per cent was the lowest.

Mr. WHEELER. I am not clear as to how they could arrive, even under the law and under the Senator's statement, at the figure of a quarter of a per cent.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will tell the Senator how it was. Wealthy men in various parts of the country having money that they did not want to lend out to private parties, especially in these troublous times, would lend it to the Government at a quarter of a per cent, or three-eighths of a per cent, and the Government issued bills for it. It was not an interest rate; it was a discount rate. The Government just accepted the money and paid this nominal rate of interest while it used the money. Wealthy men, wealthy institutions, who did not want to put their money even in bonds, and did not want to put it out in business, and did not want to put it out for any industrial purpose, or any other purpose, believing the Government to be the safest depository, would lend the money to the Government on the Government's bills at a discount of a quarter of a per cent, and that subterfuge was used by the chairman of the Shipping Board and his associates for fixing a rate of interest for 20 years at the low figure I have mentioned.

These bills, as they were called, where the Government accepted the money and paid that small rate of interest, were for a very short period of time, perhaps 30 days or 60 days, or on demand. The bills were not in that sense obligations of the Government. They were not the kind of an obligation of the Government that was referred to in the act, as is shown by the exception that was made, that the board was not to consider the 2 per cent interest on postal bonds.

Mr. WHEELER. I think the Senator is absolutely correct, and I think it is quite clear from the Senator's statement that what these men did was to violate the provisions of the law itself.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield further to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. WHEELER. I think any of these executive boards that come in here and admit that they loan money in violation of the provisions of law and through means of a subterfuge, instead of being here asking for confirmation, ought to be investigated. In fact, what ought to happen is that they should be impeached. If the Senator will pardon me further——

Mr. McKELLAR. I am glad to yield.

Mr. WHEELER. I think one of the wickedest things that has come to my attention since I have been in the Senate is the way of these men going out and loaning Government money for a 20-year period for one-fourth of a per cent. It is not only wicked, but in my judgment it is unlawful under the provisions of the act and can not be justified. I think the Senator, or whoever brought it to the attention of the Senate, deserves the praise of the Senate. I am surprised that the President of the United States would have the temerity to send the names of these men in and ask that they be confirmed.

Mr. McKELLAR. I understand the President has the record of Mr. O'Connor and that it was not sent in with his nomination. It seems to me if that is true, though I do not know whether it is true or not, that record ought to be sent to the Senate so we might examine it.

I want to propound a question to my friend, suggested to me by something he just said. If Mr. O'Connor was the president of a corporation and secretly loaned a trust fund at any such rate of interest as one-fourth of 1 per cent, and he had given a bond faithfully to carry out his trust, why would he not be liable as a matter of law?

Mr. WHEELER. I would be inclined to think that he would be liable. I would like to ask the Senator whether the Attorney General of the United States was ever asked by the Shipping Board to render an opinion before they loaned this money?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; it seems not. If the Senator will pardon me, I have the facts right before me in reference to that matter and they come next in the statement I am endeavoring to make.

The chairman of the Shipping Board first tried to hold me responsible for these rates because I would not agree to an amendment to some bill that he wanted adopted. When he found that I would not agree to that, he then fell back on the act and said he was compelled by the act to do it. When he found that was not a good excuse, that he did not have to lend the money at any specific rate of interest, but could have waited until such time as he chose to do it, then he fell back on what was called an informal opinion of the Attorney General, and I want to give the facts about that right now.

The Secretary of the Treasury, believing that the rates certified were not in accord with the intent and policies, suggested that the board arrange the loans on the basis of a contract interest rate and thus obtain a reasonable and a substantially uniform rate.

Remember, Mr. O'Connor first said he was bound by the certificate of the Treasury. Instead of that being the case, the Secretary of the Treasury did not approve of that rate and suggested another rate under the law providing for a reasonable rate.

The board explains its abandonment of this suggestion by a legal opinion from the Attorney General, which on its face—by the way, it was just a copy of something. Whether it was a real opinion of the Attorney General nobody knew. On its face it expressly mentions that it is "informal." Assuming it had been a formal opinion, intended as a basis of final action, the fact remains that such judicial or quasi-judicial bodies as the Interstate Commerce Commission and the United States Shipping Board are not, for reasons too obvious for comment, subject to or estopped by rulings or opinions of the Attorney General, hence responsibility can not be transferred to the Department of Justice. Such quasi-judicial bodies are charged with direct interpretation of laws affecting matters in their jurisdiction, subject only to judicial decisions as precedents, and subject to reversal only by the courts when wrong.

I digress long enough to say that Mr. O'Connor first tried to turn it off on me and made a woeful failure. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] gave the facts that show it was a libel upon me for the suggestion to be made. Then Mr. O'Connor undertook to place the blame on the Secretary of the Treasury and we produced his own letter from the Secretary of the Treasury in which the Secretary of the Treasury recommended another course. Then he attempted this subterfuge and that subterfuge, and finally came to the Attorney General and tried to put it on the Department of Justice. That could not be done. Mr. O'Connor had the services of an $18,000 a year lawyer, reputed to be a very excellent lawyer, receiving more than the Attorney General received. He ought to be a good lawyer. The Attorney General gets $15,000 a year, while the attorney for the Shipping Board gets $18,000 a year. Where was the attorney for the Shipping Board when the chairman was about to turn over to these shipping companies $22,000,000 of money belonging to a sacred trust fund? Where was his opinion? He was as silent as the grave. So far as the record shows he was never asked for an opinion. Yet Mr. O'Connor tried to "pass the buck" to the Department of Justice—first to the legislative branch of the Government and next to the Department of the Treasury and finally to the Attorney General.

Although the opinion previously mentioned is cited by the board in support of the procedure it followed, resulting in these abnormal rates, that opinion deals only with the right of the board to impress a higher rate on the borrower, and does not remotely negative the right of the board to refuse the loan; nor is it inconsistent with the applicant availing himself of the fundamental right of the citizen to waive a provision of civil law for his benefit and to enter into contract obligations accordingly—a basic right which obviously underlaid the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. O'Connor took the Dollar Line, which certainly needed no gift from the Government, and made this loan to them. It is one of the wealthiest corporations in the land, yet it received money at these low rates of interest, borrowing enormous sums, getting subsidies of millions of dollars a year from the Government with a bankrupt Federal Treasury. It got the money at these low rates without any complication, and the board counsel never was asked for an opinion. The Dollar Line got that loan secretly; it was disclosed to no one. I would not like to say this was a fraudulent transaction, but it is about as near a fraudulent transaction as I have ever known of not to be one.

Mr. WHEELER. In other words, if it is not fraudulent, it has all the earmarks of being fraudulent.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; it has all the earmarks and all the appearances of being fraudulent. It certainly is fraudulent in law whether intended to be fraudulent or not.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. WHEELER. I rose to say to the Senator that I think the facts he has uncovered here are such that as a matter of fact a further investigation ought to be made into the matter to discover whether or not there was not actual fraud and corruption in the lending of this money to the different shipping companies. I am not blaming the shipping companies for getting the money at as low rates as they could, but it is inconceivable to me that men intrusted with the custody of Government funds should act in the way these men have and loan the money out with such recklessness, without there being something at the bottom of it that has not been disclosed.

Mr. McKELLAR. The poor, drought-stricken farmers down in my State and in various other States are borrowing money at 6 and even 8 per cent, and glad to get it—giving collateral, too, much better than was given here, because the Government loaned to the amount of three-fourths of the value of the ships that were built—not only three-fourths of the value of the ships built but of all the improvements on those ships, including the furnishings, the kitchen ware, the table ware, and I understand that in one case they furnished three-fourths of the necessary money to build a hotel in a foreign port, and that was loaned at one-fourth of 1 per cent interest.

While the Government is treating these favored corporations in that way, what is it doing to the people to whom it loans money elsewhere? It is charging 6 per cent, and in some cases 8 per cent, and the people are glad to get it. It is indefensible that money should be loaned to these shipping companies at these low rates. I do not see how any Senator believing in a fair deal for his country can vote his approval of an unfaithful officer who would lend this money out secretly. Just remember that. It was never brought to light until the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] brought it to light through the introduction of an amendment to a bill that endeavored to correct it, and did correct it finally.

Even now the shipping companies get the money cheaper than any other class of our citizens can borrow. They get it at 3½ per cent, or at the same rate the Government pays for its money. Yet the members of the Shipping Board secretly, behind closed doors, made a contract to loan this money for 20 years at one-fourth or three-eighths of 1 per cent under an illegal interpretation of the law and without even asking their own counsel for an opinion. That should have been the first thing Mr. O'Connor thought of doing as a faithful trustee when he was asked for a loan. The first thing he should have done would have been to call in his lawyer and ask for his opinion, because he had a lawyer whom he was paying $18,000 a year. But he did not even ask his lawyer for an opinion when he was making this loan of $22,000,000 of his Government's money under these long-time contracts.

Mr. President, I do not believe I can conclude this afternoon. This is a very important matter. I think it is one of the most important matters that has come before the Senate in the form of confirmation of nominations. I think as a matter of principle and as a matter of right and as a matter of justice the nominee should not be confirmed. I would like to ask the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] if he can see his way clear to letting it go over until next week, when we can probably finish it in a short time. I will try to make my remarks more concise then and get through quickly.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, I have no desire nor has any other Senator to press the able Senator from Tennessee, who has been ill. It probably could be arranged for us to continue the discussion of this matter after 5 o'clock on Monday. How long does the Senator think it will take him to conclude?

Mr. MCKELLAR. I do not think it will take me very long to conclude.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. MCKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. COPELAND. Would the Senator be willing that I should make some response to what he has said thus far?

Mr. MCKELLAR. That would be agreeable if the Senator, before he proceeds, will let me read a letter.

Mr. MCNARY. Is it the desire of the Senator from Tennessee to have a vote to-day?

Mr. MCKELLAR. Oh, we can not get a vote to-day. That would be impossible.

Mr. MCNARY. That question has been propounded to me many times, and I should like to know in order that I may inform Members who may desire to leave the Chamber.

Mr. MCKELLAR. It will be impossible to get a vote this afternoon. I know of two or three other Senators who wish to submit some argument in connection with the nomination.

Mr. MCNARY. Does the Senator from New York desire to proceed to-day?

Mr. COPELAND. I understand the Senator from Tennessee wishes to read a letter before I proceed.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I want to invite the attention of every Senator to this letter. It absolutely disposes of the so-called certificate from the Treasury Department. It is written by Mr. O'Connor himself to Commissioner Cone and is dated July 7, 1930. This is what Mr. O'Connor says:

> In response to a request of Secretary Mellon, I visited his office this afternoon and had a conference with the Secretary, the Assistant Secretary, Mr. Hope, and the solicitor concerning the letter of July 1, which I had written them with regard to the interest rate on construction loans, in which it was suggested that the opinion of the Attorney General be obtained concerning the interpretation of the law as to the "yield" of Government securities.
> The Secretary was very sympathetic and anxious to do something to protect the Government against loans at ridiculously low rates of interest.

Here we have the chairman of the commission conferring with the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of the Treasury saying to the chairman of the committee that these were "ridiculously low rates of interest."

> He thought that a request on the Attorney General for an opinion would undoubtedly bring a confirmation of the position which they had taken, notwithstanding they felt that it was not the intention of Congress that money should be loaned at such low rate as results from the position taken in the past.
> They suggested—

That is, Mr. Mellon and Mr. Hope—> that the Shipping Board should take the position that 3 per cent would be the rate, and that it be handled as a matter of agreement between the borrower and the Shipping Board, in which event nobody would be allowed to complain.

That is Mr. O'Connor giving the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury. I am glad the Senator from Michigan is present, because he asked the question if the Secretary of the Treasury was not more to blame than the chairman of the board. Here is the Secretary of the Treasury saying that the chairman of the Shipping Board should make a contract rate instead of lending money at a rate of interest which was comparatively nothing.

> And in view of the fact—

This is Mr. O'Connor writing—

> And in view of the fact that the administrative officers would be a party to loaning money for 20 years at a ridiculously low rate, which loans we were not bound to make at all under the law, that the parties thereto agree to a specific rate.

Here is the chairman of the Shipping Board saying that they did not have to make any loan under the law and the Secretary of the Treasury advised him that the rate ought to be specified by contract. Why did he not do it? Instead of following the advice of the Secretary of the Treasury, instead of following that which Mr. O'Connor himself said was right, he listened to the siren voice of friends who wanted the money at low rates of interest, and he loaned it to them at the expense of the American public.

> They also suggested that in such case it would be better for the Shipping Board not to ask for a certification from the Treasury.

They did not have to ask for a certification of the Treasury; there was nothing in the law that obligated them to do so:

> They also suggested that in such case it would be better for the Shipping Board not to ask for a certification from the Treasury, but to proceed to fix a rate by agreement between the borrower and the board without such certification.
> In other words, they thought that a ruling by the Attorney General would make it all the more difficult to handle the matter in this way, as the Attorney General would undoubtedly sustain the position which the Treasury felt they were forced to take as to the interest under the law.
> T. V. O'CONNOR, Chairman.

It was the advice of the Treasury Department, and afterwards the advice of the Department of Justice, in the informal opinion of the Attorney General, that the board had a right to make contract with them, the shipping companies, and ought to do it. Yet he disregarded that advice and continued secretly to make contracts at these ridiculously low rates of interest, costing the American people and the American Government $22,000,000 on the amounts that were loaned.

It is indefensible. No man should be restored to an office of this kind who has so flagrantly violated his duty to the American people and to the American Government. He is an unfaithful trustee and his nomination ought not to be confirmed by this body.

I do not know how Senators feel about it; I have talked to practically none of them concerning it, but my own view is that no man who loves his country and wants to see its rights protected, especially at a time like this, would have taken such action. We ought to be careful about placing in office, especially offices to which such tremendous powers are attached, to injure the Government, men who fail to carry out the duties of trustees.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WHEELER. I merely wish to make an observation. While they were drafting the Republican platform in Chicago one thing they ought to have done was to put a plank in the platform praising the services Mr. O'Connor and the other members of the Shipping Board had rendered the country by loaning to shipbuilders money at low rates of interest.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I will merely say to the Senator that I feel so keenly that the nominee in this case is not the kind of a man we should confirm as chairman of the Shipping Board that I do not think we ought to look at it from a partisan standpoint. I feel regretful, sir, that any man should have disregarded his duty as Mr. O'Connor has disregarded his. It is very regrettable when any trustee is found to be unfaithful; but the indisputable facts in this record show that he has been an unfaithful trustee; that he has violated the obligations of his office; his nomination ought not to be confirmed, and I hope that it will not be confirmed.

Mr. President, I have not concluded, but I am worn out, and I hope the Senator from New York may now go on, if he desires to do so, and I will continue at another time.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, let me inquire of the Senator from Tennessee if he will be willing that on Monday we conclude this matter?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not want to make a positive statement about it, but I will do my best. I merely want to put the facts before the Senate and let every Senator vote as he sees fit.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will there be a vote on this question to-day?

Mr. McKELLAR. There will not be a vote on it to-day.

Mr. COPELAND. There can be no vote to-day, as I understand. I thought I would reply to some extent to what the Senator from Tennessee has said, so that the record might be complete, and then on Monday the Senator from Tennessee will complete his argument.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think there may be others who want to speak; I think there will be, and we must not preclude them; but I promise the Senator from New York that I will hurry the matter along in every way I can.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I hope the Senator from New York will analyze the objections that have been made and answer them seriatim.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to his colleague?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. Is it the purpose to continue this discussion on Monday morning or to take some time later in the day for it?

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator from Oregon suggested that at the close of the session on Monday we would have an executive session. There will be no interference with my colleague's bill which is now pending.

Mr. WAGNER. I was going to suggest that perhaps we could agree upon a time when we would vote on this nomination.

Mr. COPELAND. Of course, that is for the Senator from Tennessee to say.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, there is another Senator who is not now present who I know wants to be heard, and in his absence I could not consent to such an agreement.

Mr. WAGNER. I was speaking as one who is in favor of the nomination.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I understand; but I am sure there will be time arranged so that it will not interfere with the orderly discussion of the relief bill which, to my mind, is the most important matter before us.

Mr. WAGNER. I thank my colleague.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I know the sincerity of the Senator from Tennessee. No one in the Senate respects him more highly than do I. Through the many years we have been here together we have seen eye to eye on occasions and have been in opposition to each other on other occasions, but our friendship has been unchanged always and I know it will be, no matter what may be the outcome of this particular issue.

Mr. President, there can be no doubt that the American merchant marine is the pampered child of the United States Government. There is no wonder that it is, and for my part I am glad that it is. When the great World War came on, we found that we had under the United States flag 15 ships in transoceanic traffic. Except for the providence of God, I know not what might have happened when we found it necessary to send the American Expeditionary Forces to Europe. In our harbors were certain German ships, among others the ship now known as the Leviathan; that one ship, which belonged to the Germans, carried 275,000 of our boys across to help our allies; and I have no doubt that that act had very much to do with the winning of the war.

The cry during the war was ships, more ships, more ships. That was the demand of our allies; it was the demand of our military leaders; it was the demand of the President and the demand of Congress that ships should be built. As a matter of fact, many ships were built; 2,500 ships were built, aggregating ten and a quarter million tons of shipping. Most of those ships were built hurriedly, hastily, imperfectly. When the war was over, we had and still have hundreds of ships, useless gestures, ships that have no maritime value, ships that have no sale value, ships that have no scrap value.

We organized the Shipping Board, and under it the Fleet Corporation. We set out to establish lines of service between the various ports of the United States and foreign ports. Those lines, to begin with, were operated by the Government—expensively operated. The losses in operation were tremendous, and the appropriations necessarily were enormous.

Every effort has been made to sell the ships acquired by the Government. It was the declared policy of the Jones-White Act that the ships should be disposed of to private parties at the earliest possible moment. That was in the act of 1920, and it was reinforced later by the Jones-White Act.

Many Members of the Senate felt that the cheapest and best way to get rid of these ships was to take them out to sea and sink them. It was a great problem; but the Congress proceeded with the matter, every argument was used and every effort was made to build up an effective American merchant marine. I know the pride I felt in taking part in the proceedings when there was pending here what was known as the Jones-White bill. The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] and the now Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE], then a Member of the House, were the parents of that bill.

It was very soon determined that it was necessary that these various lines of vessels should be reinforced. Some of the ships we had taken over from the Germans and acquired in other ways were growing old. It was not possible to balance these various lines and put them in shape to operate successfully in competition with the ships of nations of the Old World. In the Senate every single thought afterwards written into law was aired and discussed, and conclusions were reached which finally were adopted by almost unanimous vote, and the merchant marine act, the Jones-White Act, became the law.

At that time it was determined that construction loans should be provided. The first appropriation we made, known as the regional fund, was $125,000,000. It was not intended that in the loaning of this money profit should be had by the Government. It was intended that every effort should be made and every encouragement given to get the operators of the various American lines to build more ships to balance the lines and services which had been established.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from New York took part in the passage of that act. The Senator will remember that the purpose of putting in this interest-rate provision was stated on the floor of the Senate in argument—that it was to let the shipping people have the money at the same rate of interest at which the Government got it. I desire to ask the Senator if he ever dreamed that the Shipping Board, under that provision of the law, would lend money at any such ridiculous rates as one-quarter of 1 per cent or three-eighths of 1 per cent.

Mr. COPELAND. In answer to the Senator, I will say that I was not concerned about what the rate of interest would be. I was concerned and helped to write a law which would make certain that the money advanced should be returned. Every safeguard was thrown around the return of the money.

In the first place, not to exceed three-quarters of the cost of the ship was to be loaned by the Government. In other words, we did not go into any fly-by-night transaction. In order to build a $4,000,000 ship the operators must invest a million dollars of their own money before they had any loan from the Government. Then the rate of interest was fixed by law; and we might just as well refer to that now.

I find that in section 301, Title III, providing for the construction loan fund, the arrangement was made about these loans, first that they should be for 20 years; that the amount loaned should not exceed three-quarters of the cost; and that this sum of $125,000,000 thus set aside should be known as the construction loan fund. I read from the act:

> The board may use such fund to the extent it thinks proper, upon such terms as the board may prescribe, in making loans to aid persons citizens of the United States in the construction by them in private shipyards or navy yards in the United States of vessels of the best and most efficient type for the establishment or maintenance of service on lines deemed desirable or necessary by the board.

Now, I read from subsection (d) of the law relating to these loans:

> (d) All such loans shall bear interest at rates as follows, payable not less frequently than annually: During any period in which the vessel is operated exclusively in coastwise trade, or is inactive, the rate of interest shall be as fixed by the board, but not less than 5¼ per cent per annum.

Now, we come to the matter which has been referred to by my able friend from Tennessee, and I quote from the law:

> During any period in which the vessel is operated in foreign trade the rate shall be the lowest rate of yield (to the nearest one-eighth of 1 per cent) of any Government obligation bearing a date of issue subsequent to April 6, 1917 (except postal-savings bonds), and outstanding at the time the loan is made by the board, as certified by the Secretary of the Treasury to the board upon its request. The board may prescribe rules for determining the amount of interest payable under the provisions of this paragraph.

Mr. President, I do not know what other Senators have in mind. So far as I was personally concerned, I had in mind one thing. That was the upbuilding of the American merchant marine; and this quotation from the law shows what the Congress of the United States, after study and debate, determined should be the rate of interest.

The Senator from Maine has called attention to the sacredness of this particular rate of interest. He has mentioned various farm-loan acts, the farm relief bill, the bill which relieved the farmers of almost everything they had left when it became law. Last week and the first part of this week we had before us Senate bill 4536, a bill to amend the agricultural marketing act, approved June 15, 1929; and on page 11 of this bill, beginning at line 12, I find this language:

> There shall be withdrawn from the stabilization fund for any agricultural commodity * * *; repayments into the revolving fund of advances made from the revolving fund to the stabilization fund, together with interest on such amounts at a rate of interest per annum equal to the lowest rate of yield (to the nearest one-eighth of 1 per cent of any Government obligation) bearing a date of issue subsequent to the time the advance is made by the board, as certified by the Secretary of the Treasury to the board upon its request.

That is the language that we used in the Jones-White Act. I do not remember who originated the language or wrote the language in the first place; but it seems to have become sacred to our institutions, and was repeated in the farm relief act and was written in a bill which we considered no later than this week. Within a few days' time we proposed to have money returned at a rate of interest which should be "the lowest rate of yield to the nearest one-eighth of 1 per cent of any Government obligation."

That is exactly what happened with reference to the law which we enacted. That was the law.

Under the terms of that law the board entered into contracts. Those contracts were recited in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 27, 1932. Beginning at page 11370, my distinguished friend from Tennessee had printed a statement of loans by the United States Shipping Board at interest rates lower than 3½ per cent, compiled May, 1932, from official statements of the board by John Nicolson. I find in this list of contracts 32 separate and distinct arrangements made with shipping lines. Now let me speak about them.

The Senator from Tennessee spoke about the loan to the Export Steamship Corporation, No. 4 in this list. If a shipping line desired to make a loan, it applied to the Shipping Board; and the Shipping Board, after a study of the application, determined the merits of the case, the ability of the corporation to repay the money, and particularly the ability of the corporation to operate successfully a line of American ships. After these facts had been determined, the Shipping Board made a contract. That contract was made in accordance with the law; that while the ship was building, before it was documented, as it came from the brain of Jove, full panoplied and perfect in every form, as it were, until it was ready actually to serve the country in interoceanic trade, it had to pay 5¼ per cent per annum according to the law. Then, when it was documented, it was the business of the board to apply to the Secretary of the Treasury to find out what should be the rate of interest upon the construction loan. The rate of interest while the ship was in foreign trade was to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

It was customary, and, indeed, the law, to ask the Secretary of the Treasury for the rate which should be charged on the loan. Mind you, the Shipping Board did not make the rate; the Secretary of the Treasury determined what the rate was to be.

I hold in my hand, for instance, a letter, which happens to be the only one I have in my possession, but there is on file in the Shipping Board a report from the Secretary of the Treasury covering each and every instance where a loan was made.

This is what the Treasury Department wrote to the Shipping Board with reference to one particular transaction:

> Hon. T. V. O'CONNOR,
> Chairman United States Shipping Board,
> Washington, D. C.:
> In compliance with telephone request of Mr. Fitch to-day, I hereby certify that the interest rate as of April 1, 1930, for loans by the board from the construction loan fund pursuant to the provisions of subsection (d) of section 11 of the merchant marine act of 1920, as amended by the act of May 22, 1928, is 2¾ per cent per annum, interest payable semiannually.
> This rate is the lowest rate of yield (to the nearest one-eighth of 1 per cent), of any obligation of the Government bearing date of issue subsequent to April 6, 1917 (except Postal Savings bonds), and outstanding on March 31, 1930. The particular obligations concerned are the 4⅞ per cent Treasury certificates of Series TM 1930, which on March 31, 1930, were quoted at 100$\frac{13}{32}$ to 100$\frac{14}{32}$, giving a yield rate as computed by the Government actuary of 2.756 per cent.
> By direction of the Secretary,
> Respectfully,
> WALTER E. HOPE,
> Assistant Secretary.

Mr. President, in every instance the Secretary of the Treasury certified to the Shipping Board how much the rate should be.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. May I call attention to the fact that that certificate is the first one from the Treasury Department which fixed a rate less than 3 per cent, and that it was immediately thereafter that the matter of the rate was taken up in the Shipping Board, and immediately thereafter the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] introduced his amendment fixing a minimum of 3½ per cent, which legislation had the approval of the Shipping Board.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator. He has stated the facts,

Mr. President, I am not going to evade the suggestion made by my friend the Senator from Tennessee where he asked as to why they did not get busy on this matter before. I shall come to that, and I speak of it now to notify the Senate of my intention.

I am a member of the Committee on Commerce, and have been for a great many years. There came to us from the House on the 6th of January, 1930, House bill 7998. That was a bill to amend subsection (d) of section 11, the very subsection to which I have just made reference. The bill came to us from the House with the same language in it which I have quoted as having been found in the act of 1928 with reference to loans, that is, that it should be the lowest rate of yield, to the nearest one-eighth of 1 per cent, of any obligation bearing date of issue subsequent to April 6, 1917.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, is that the bill in which the Senator from Michigan afterwards changed the rate of interest?

Mr. COPELAND. It is, and of that I shall speak now in some detail.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact, while he speaks of that, that when the matter first came up, Mr. O'Connor said that the Shipping Board had caused a change in the interest rate in the House bill, which had been introduced at their request.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator. I want to have the record perfectly clear. I do not want to evade anything. I want the Senate to have the exact facts.

This bill passed the House on February 28, 1930.

Mr. McKELLAR. What is the number of the bill?

Mr. COPELAND. It is House bill 7998. On the legislative day of January 6, but the calendar day of March 1, 1930, it was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill received the very earnest attention of the Committee on Commerce, and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] called attention to the extremely low rate rewritten into this bill from the merchant marine act of 1928. He impressed his views upon the committee, and communicated with the Shipping Board, and finally offered an amendment, which was accepted by the committee, striking out the language found in lines 7 to 14, inclusive, which language was a repetition of the language found in the law of 1928, and in place of it used this language, "as fixed by the board, but not less than 3½ per cent per annum," so that it would read:

> During the period in which a vessel is being constructed, equipped, reconditioned, remodeled, or improved, and/or during any period in which such vessel is operated in foreign trade, the rate shall be as fixed by the board, but not less than 3½ per cent per annum.

Mr. President, when this bill was pending in the Senate, on my motion an amendment was accepted to the effect that this should apply to "contracts hereafter made." I speak of that because from time to time in his able address to-day the Senator from Tennessee referred to contracts apparently made after the enactment of this legislation, but the law as it finally passed related only to contracts made after the enactment of the law.

I am going now to make reference to the history of the bill to which I referred a moment ago, House bill 7998; I want to make reference to the senatorial history of that bill, and I do not do this to be disagreeable, but I want the RECORD to show the facts.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], from the Committee on Commerce, on the 21st of April, the calendar day of April 24, 1930, reported the bill from the committee, and it went upon the calendar, where it was known as Calendar No. 520, and for the sake of the RECORD, in case somebody wants to know, it was in the Seventy-first Congress, second session, and the report is No. 522.

In all good fellowship, I want the RECORD to show what happened to that bill. The Bible tells us that Job said, "Oh, that mine adversary had written a book." Of course there is no particular application of that, but the RECORD is wonderful in sometimes calling attention to our shortcomings.

This bill (H. R. 7998) to amend subsection (d) of section 11 was called up on the 12th of May, 1930. I quote now from page 8758 of the RECORD:

> Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, it is my purpose to object to the present consideration of the bill.
> Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; I want to object to it, too.

Mr. McKELLAR. In order that the record may be complete let me read from page 8758 of the RECORD of the same day, May 12, 1930. The Senator from New York asked that the bill be recommitted. He stated, and I quote from the RECORD:

> This bill is one which met with unanimous opposition among shipping men in my section of the country and, I understand, elsewhere. My own inclination would be to have the bill recommitted to the committee.

I am glad to have my record presented, and I am just as glad to have the Senator's position noted at the same time.

Mr. COPELAND. It is only fair that it should be. Now, let us have the record entirely complete.

Mr. McKELLAR. All right; I have it here, too.

Mr. COPELAND. I read from page 8758 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 12, 1930:

> Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I find that among the amendments offered to this bill is one which met unanimous opposition among shipping men in my section of the country and, I understand, elsewhere. My own inclination would be to have the bill recommitted to the committee.
> Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, it is my purpose to object to the present consideration of the bill.
> Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; I want to object to it, too.
> Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, if the Senators will withhold their objection for a moment, I wish to ask unanimous consent that the bill be recommitted because there are certain steamship lines which should be heard before the bill is placed upon its passage. I do not know whether that is agreeable to the Senator from Oregon or not, but, in my opinion, that is what should be done.

Objection was made and the bill was not acted upon that day. My objection to the bill, which I voiced there, was founded upon the fact that the contracts had been made, arrangements had been made for funds, and the shipping lines did not wish to have a retroactive law. Later the objection which I had to the bill, which was that it ought not to apply to contracts already made, was cured in the Senate by the adoption of the amendment which I proposed that it should not apply to contracts already made.

Now I must be very careful to get the record complete.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator will find the next date when it was brought up was June 2, 1930, at page 9856 of the RECORD.

Mr. COPELAND. That is correct. I am glad the Senator is so accurate. At the point indicated by the Senator from Tennessee I find the following:

> The bill (H. R. 7998) to amend subsection (d) of section 11 of the merchant marine act of June 5, 1920, as amended by section 301 of the merchant marine act of May 22, 1928, was announced as next in order.
> Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——
> The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has heretofore been considered and the amendments have been agreed to.
> Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, we now have before us the bill proposing to amend the merchant marine act. I have discussed with the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] a proposed amendment. Is he prepared to offer the amendment now?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I have no objection to the amendment suggested to me in personal conversation with the Senator from New York, if he refers to the amendment which would still leave a fixed minimum interest rate, but which would restore the proposal that the loans shall be made under a fixed rule by the board. Is that what the Senator from New York has in mind?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, this is a very important bill, and I ask that it may go over.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think the bill might just as well go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Now, if the Senator will turn to a later date, December 15, 1930, when it was brought up again, he will find that between June 2 and December 15, when that bill went over from one session to the other, there were but two loans made by the Shipping Board. They were not made under this interest provision, but were made under a contract rate at 3 per cent, as the board had a right to do. Certainly no harm was done by letting the matter go over. As a matter of fact, it seems to have been rather the unanimous opinion of the Senator from New York, the Senator from Michigan, and the Senator from Tennessee, myself, that under the circumstances it ought to go over, and it did go over.

Mr. COPELAND. At any rate, it went over, and it was the objection of the Senator from Tennessee that put it over.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Oh, no; it was just as much the objection of the Senator from New York and very much more the objection of the Senator from Michigan, because he had the bill in charge. I do not know whether he just yielded to the Senator's pleadings, or possibly to my pleadings, but anyhow we were all three agreed, and I do not see how the kettle can call the pot black under these circumstances, when all three of us agreed to it.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I was neither the pot nor the kettle!

Mr. MCKELLAR. I agree to that; because I think if anybody should be called that it should be the Senator from New York and myself.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, may I inquire if this is a case of all three of the Senators being "partners in crime"?

Mr. MCKELLAR. No; I think we were partners in a very just desire to get rid of a rate of interest or a provision in the law that ought never to have been in the law for any purpose whatsoever.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, as one of the "kitchen utensils" I desire to observe in this connection that on the 2d of June this bill should have passed—certainly from my standpoint it should have passed because I was satisfied. I was not interested in the interest rate. I was in the fullest accord with that change and I think we owe a great debt to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] for it. I was in fullest accord with that change, but my objection, which was that it should not apply to contracts already made, was answered so I wanted the bill to pass.

Mr. MCKELLAR. The Senator is mistaken in his recollection. Let me read the Senator's statement made on that same day:

Mr. COPELAND. I suggest to the Senator from Michigan that he perfect the bill with all the amendments which have been agreed to except the pending amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee is not pending—

I did not even have an amendment pending to the bill. It has not yet been offered.

Mr. COPELAND. I have not reached that date yet.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I expect I anticipated the Senator.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator has thrown his kitchen utensil out of the window before its time. I want to refer a little more to June 2. The bill should have passed on the 2d of June, and it would have passed except for the objection of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. MCKELLAR. And the Senator from New York and the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator from Michigan can speak for himself. When he said "I think the bill might just as well go over," he no doubt knew the Senator from Tennessee so well that he believed it might as well go over because the Senator from Tennessee was against it.

Now, we come to the next date, which the Senator from Tennessee has anticipated, December 15, 1930. We can not blame the Senator from Tennessee for this unless he was responsible for the act of his agent. On the request of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON], who was in sympathy with the purposes of the bill, but unwilling to have it passed in the absence of the Senator from Tennessee, he raised the objection and the bill went over.

Now, we come to January 13, 1931. Am I right in that?

Mr. MCKELLAR. No; the Senator omitted to say that the very next day the bill came up.

Mr. COPELAND. The next day?

Mr. MCKELLAR. Indeed, after the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON] had objected on my behalf—I came into the Chamber later—it seems, and the request for the consideration of the bill was renewed and then the bill went over. On the very next day, December 16——

Mr. COPELAND. Just a moment, so we may have the record straight. The Senator calls attention to page 605 of the RECORD, where Mr. MCKELLAR said:

I desire to offer an amendment to the bill.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Yes; and the RECORD shows the following:

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOWELL. I ask for the regular order.

Thereupon the bill went over. The very next day, as shown at page 788 of the RECORD, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] did not call up the bill, but placed in the RECORD a letter from Secretary Mellon to Chairman O'Connor, and said:

I apprehend that the theory of the Jones-White law was that the Government should loan its credit to the new American merchant marine at cost; which is to say, without profit or loss. But the existing arrangement spells inevitable loss. Our average cost of public money over the years is about 3½ per cent. On every million dollars loaned at 1.7 per cent for 20 years, the loss to the Government in that period is $360,000. Inasmuch as the loans are large, the loss also will be large.

When I called this situation to the attention of the Shipping Board several months ago the board promptly recognized the jeopardy. It joined me in the demand for relief. The pending bill, recommended by the Commerce Committee, resulted.

Mr. COPELAND. That is right. Now, to continue the record, I come to January 13, 1931. That is about a year after the bill was first introduced in the House. I find this astonishing statement at page 2067 of the RECORD. The bill was before the Senate at the time:

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me, I just want to say that I have never at any time interposed any objection to his bill.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Read on now.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is correct.

I just want to keep the record straight. I am quoting from the same RECORD.

Mr. COPELAND. I know the Senator is; but I think the Senator from Michigan was in rather a kindly mood that day.

Mr. MCKELLAR. He always is.

Mr. COPELAND. Yes; he is.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Before the Senator leaves that, will he let me quote just a little bit more from the RECORD? I read from the same page of the RECORD:

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me, I just want to say that I have never at any time interposed any objection to his bill.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is correct.

Mr. MCKELLAR. What I did was to propose an amendment, which has been pending for probably nearly a year, and the Senator felt that he could not accept that amendment. I think the Senator's bill ought to pass. I have always told him that.

I think there is a condition which ought to be corrected, and which ought to be corrected right away, and that view has led me to withdraw my amendment.

I am not expressing any discontent with my amendment; I would very much prefer that the Senator should accept it and that it should be adopted, but I understand the legislative situation, and I am making no complaint of the Senator about that. I think his bill ought to pass, and I hope it will pass as soon as possible.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator correctly states his position, as I understand it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the Senate committee apparently proposed a number of amendments to the bill.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I may say to the Senator that the bill as it came to us from the House—

And so forth.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, without any malice or desire to be disagreeable, the fact remains that in his enthusiasm to have enacted into law a prohibition against loans to shipping lines flying foreign flags, the Senator from Tennessee made use of this vehicle time after time so that the passage of the bill was delayed by his intervention. I say that in all kindness and we will leave it at that.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Is it the Senator's desire to continue the discussion this evening or would he prefer to conclude his remarks on another day?

Mr. COPELAND. I will conclude in a few moments. I merely wish to say a few more words in closing, because I have no right to keep Senators here.

Mr. O'Connor has been a member of the board for a good many years. He comes from my State; and six years ago President Coolidge did me the honor to discuss with me the question of his reappointment. Within an hour after that discussion Mr. O'Connor's name was sent to the Senate. By the very nature of my position as a Senator from New York, a State which has the greatest port in the world, the center of the operations of the American merchant marine, it has been my business to acquaint myself with the activities of the Shipping Board, and, so far as I could, to further the welfare of American shipping.

During the years I have been in the Senate—about 10 years—I have had constant contact with the Shipping Board. Without criticism of the men now upon the board, or who have been upon the board, there have been dissensions in the board. Almost beyond the memory of man there have been two groups, two cliques, in the board. I do not undertake to say why; I do not know why; but they have existed. For most of the time certainly Mr. O'Connor has been in the minority group. I have felt at times that there were jealousies. I am speaking about a long time ago now, because I do not want to reflect upon the men who are now serving on the board. I can not undertake to analyze the reasons or to diagnose the case as regards the conditions existing in the board, but there has been that division. Mr. O'Connor, as I have said, has been almost invariably in the minority. He has had the cordial and loyal support of the President of the United States, no matter who that President might be. He has served now, if my memory is correct, under three Presidents. I have not observed anything in his personal or official conduct that would lead me to doubt him in the least. I think he is an honest man. There have been many times when I was out of sympathy with a policy which he contended for, but I thought all the time that he knew more about it than I did.

Mr. President, as a last word to-day—I hope to speak again upon the matter on Monday—let me say that if there is one man on the board who has fought the fight for higher interest rates, that man has been T. V. O'Connor. I do not care whether he may have been stimulated to do that. Any one of us in official life knows that from time to time he has to be jogged a little bit from policies which he has followed for a long time. We have to have called to our attention the significance of things which we have come to disregard. If one goes into a household, I do not care where it is, he is likely to say, "For Heaven's sake, why do you not hang this picture over there or put that piece of furniture over here?" But we become accustomed to things as they are. It may be that during all these years, and I think it to be a fact, it was felt that the board was carrying out exactly what it thought to be the law; and it was the law. But whether stimulated by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] and others when this matter was brought to their attention, who was the man who rose at once; who was the man who dealt vigorously with the question? It was the chairman of the board, Mr. O'Connor. He was not a member of the finance committee of the board; Admiral Cone and Mr. Denton were those men; but he demanded that there should be found a way to deal more effectively with the question of interest rates.

On Monday, if it shall be necessary, I shall show that there was a conference held in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury where there was discussed how they might arrange this matter of interest, regardless of what the letter of the law might be, and where it was decided that by contract, when the first loan was made or the agreement to make it was made, they might say then what the rate should be, and not the low rate provided for by the law but a rate sufficient to provide for the ordinary return upon money.

Mr. President, I say that Mr. O'Connor is worthy of his high office; he has not been found guilty of one charge of dereliction; in my opinion, his nomination should be confirmed, and he should be allowed to continue his useful service to his country as chairman of the Shipping Board.

PUBLIC-WORKS PROGRAM—ADDITIONAL AMENDMENTS

The Senate resumed its legislative session.

Mr. BULKLEY submitted three amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 12445) to relieve destitution, to broaden the lending powers of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and to create employment by authorizing and expediting a public-works program and providing a method of financing such program, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

CONDUCT OF VETERANS IN WASHINGTON

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article appearing in to-day's Washington Times written by Elsie Robinson. It contains a thought worth reading.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GRIM, STANCH, THEY BEAR IT MANFULLY—COMMANDER'S ELOQUENT PLEA FORESTALLS ANY ATTEMPT AT DEMONSTRATION

By Elsie Robinson

Terror poured itself into Washington yesterday.
Dragged its soundless horror through the lovely avenues—
Sprawled its cold shadow across the flower-filled parks—
Crawled and slithered around the stately mansions—
Oozed across the guarded threshold of the White House—
Wrapt its icy coils, tight and tighter, about the Capitol itself.
Terror, of a kind it has never known before, gripped Washington.
And then a wonder incredible—never to be forgotten!

The Capitol—velvety acres before it, dark trees massed against a fragile sky. Vast, white steps rising tier upon tier, endlessly, up and up and up to the proud, pillared portico.

DARKENED GROUPS

All gleaming white and flashing gold and glimmering blue, that splendid scene. But a small darkness began to trickle and gather and clot upon the face of that radiance.

A darkness of men—

Ragged men, their ribs protruding through their tattered shirts—

Limping men, their scarred feet shuffling in broken shoes—

Desperate men, with eyes curiously blank, as though they had seen too much agony to register anything ever again.

The bonus marchers were on the move.

They were coming up to the Capitol to hear what the Senate voted about their bill.

Coming up by ones and twos, in groups and squads—in hundreds and thousands, out of the garbage dumps and littered wastes where a grateful Nation has housed them for the last two weeks.

Coming very quietly, looking neither to right nor left.

But the terror spread as they came.

What would they do, these men with the long, sloughing stride, the battered, fighting faces? What frightfulness would happen when they heard—as hear they must—that the Senators had beaten their bill?

THE COMMANDER

Eight o'clock. Very dark now. Arc lights on with the waiting faces green disks beneath them. Booming flash lights. Crackling silence. Some one started the Marine Band to playing, nervously.

And now—

The police are beginning to close in, down all the corridors, are moving up and down the boulevard. But none of them are in with the men. In one great block of darkness they sit alone. Above them the brilliant arcs turning its crimson into bars of blood floats their great flag.

And now—

There is a sudden movement under the portico. The crowd of waiting reporters and spectators parts and a man hurries through. Standing beneath the flag, face gutted with fatigue, the young commander waits. So briefly it comes—that smashing of 20,000 dreams.

"They've licked it."

The listening face seems to waver for a second, the clenched fists steady themselves against the swaying thighs. Then, saber swift, he answers:

"Tell them we are disappointed but not discouraged. This will not make a particle of difference in our plans. We shall stay and we shall win! And this act, instead of disheartening us, will serve a good purpose, for it will make the Nation understand that the men who are supposed to represent the common man are not fit for their great duty."

A spit handful of words, then he wheeled, leaped down the steps into the glare of the arc, and faced the men.

BUT NOT DEFEAT

Faced them and told them quickly that the bill was killed. Here was a failure but not defeat.

A gasp—the whole mass rose—but still he held them. Held them with a challenge. He cried:

"They've shown their stuff; now show yours.

"Take it on the chin! They've said you'd riot. They'll be justified and excused if you riot. You've held yourself steady through all the days; you've made the whole Nation believe in you in spite of everything they could say against you. Justify this Nation's faith.

"You aren't going home, but you are going back to that camp. Get up! Don't look back. Walk down these steps and form in line, and as you go sing 'America'!"

PAYMENT OF WAR DEBTS TO THE UNITED STATES

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD two news items that appeared in the Washington Herald on June 17, 1932, and in the Washington Times on June 19, 1932, in the form of a suggestion to the United States coming from the Lausanne conference that we should aid Europe settle her troubles, which means in effect that we should cancel her debts to us.

The news item is similar to many others that have been circulated in this country for several years, all calculated to confuse the public mind about the status of Europe's debts to us.

During the war we loaned England $4,715,000,000; France, $4,400,000,000; Italy, $2,150,000,000, and other nations, 12 in all, smaller amounts. We made separate arrangements with each country how this money was to be repaid. America issued bonds and sold them to the American people to raise this money and agreed to pay these bonds when due and agreed to pay an average of 4 per cent or more in interest until they are paid in full.

At no time when these loans were negotiated was it understood that the foreign countries were not to repay us, that repayment depended on German reparations, or that there were any conditions attached to the repayment of them. Europe was anxious and glad to get help from us to maintain her credit to carry on the war, to rebuild afterwards.

When the war was over, our foreign creditors hesitated to begin repayment; delayed in the matter of refunding the debts in the form of bonds as they agreed to do. They intimated that we had not done our duty, as we did not enter the war sooner; we had stayed out at their expense and thereby caused heavier burdens to rest on them. This argument was freely advanced.

Then they argued that we should enter into negotiations tending toward debt adjustments. The European nations had loaned each other money with which to buy war material from each other. For instance, France bought goods from England for which England extended France credit. England bought goods from France for which France extended England credit. Likewise, Italy bought goods from each of these nations and for which each of them extended Italy credit, and they in turn bought goods from Italy for which Italy gave them credit and so on among each of our Allies.

Those nations met and agreed to offset each others' debts and to pay cash or with bonds for any difference that any of them owed the others.

However, it is manifestly unfair to the United States to include us in any such arrangements. We paid cash for our soldiers over there, for our ships to transport them in, for materials we bought for them, for transportation to the front to fight their battles, in short for everything we got from them for which we agreed to pay them, we paid in cash. Hence, there could be no debts to offset in so far as we were concerned. Any arguments to that effect are false propaganda tending to hurt us and to confuse the public mind to cause it to demand that we recede from demanding our just dues and prejudice our rights to collect from them.

The foreign countries demanded reparations from Germany which they compelled her to pay and which she is still obligated to pay. We got none. We had no part in any war-debt negotiations. Nevertheless Europe has circulated falsehoods to the effect that it is the fault of the United States that Germany has to pay reparations; that were it not for the fact that we demand payments from our allies, they would not demand reparations from Germany. The result is all of Europe now brands us as Uncle Shylock and Uncle Sham, after we loaned them money for the war, for their reconstruction period to help them on their feet, and for every purpose for which they needed credit.

While this propaganda has been going on the United States agreed to settle her debts with Europe, dealing with each nation separately, and settled as follows: England owed us $4,715,000,000; we canceled the principal and agreed to take 3.7 per cent interest for a period of 62 years. France owed us $4,400,000,000; we canceled the principal and agreed to take 2.17 per cent interest for a period of 62 years. Italy owed us $2,150,000,000; we canceled the principal and agreed to take 1.1 per cent interest for a period of 62 years. As a total from all our allies we agreed to cancel the principal and to take in return approximately 2 per cent interest for a period of 62 years.

This settlement is most fair to our allies; in fact, grossly unfair to our country in view of the fact that not only do we pay 4 per cent interest on this same principal money which we loaned them to our American bondholders but as the bonds mature we have to pay the principal as well. Our country had to borrow the money it loaned Europe from our citizens and has to repay them whether it collects from Europe or not. No wonder we complain about being in financial straits and unable to pay our own soldiers a bonus.

None of this small settlement has been paid as yet. Instead of paying it our former allies set up further propaganda to cancel this interest also. They plead poverty and distress and tell Germany that she will have to pay her war reparations now that America demands her money. In fact, on this very day Premier Herriot, of France, has demanded of Germany that she pay her war reparations.

Europe, more especially France and England, is anxious to becloud this issue to prevent its debtors from knowing the true facts. They have large sums of money outstanding due to them which they would not want their debtors to demand cancellation on. Hence they are anxious to befuddle the public mind as to the money they owe us so as not to cause their debtors to ask for cancellation. For this reason they are willing to sacrifice our friendship and our influence in order that they may the better gain this end of cancellation in behalf of themselves and their creditors and yet not cause their own debtors to demand similar privileges.

America should demand payment of this small and insignificant debt. Europe ought to pay and can pay.

There being no objection, the articles were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Washington Times of June 18, 1932]

FRENCH PRAISE HERRIOT STAND AT LAUSANNE—OPPOSITION TO CANCELLATION OF GERMAN DEBT HELD VITAL ATTITUDE

PARIS, June 18.—Premier Herriot, returning from Lausanne to-day to preside over a session of the French Cabinet, finds almost universal approval here for the stand he took at the reparations conference yesterday against immediate cancellation of Germany's war-debt obligations.

He will return to Lausanne Monday for resumption of the discussions with representatives of Great Britain, Italy, Belgium, Germany, and Japan, carrying the complete confidence of his ministers and the majority of the chamber of deputies.

It was Herriot's first encounter with spokesmen for the other great powers. Even his opponents of the extreme right conceded he had acquitted himself well in upholding the French thesis that complete cancellation of German reparation payments at this time, without a corresponding concession on the part of the United States, would shortly put Germany in economic leadership of the powers of Europe.

Despite reiterated statements from Washington to the contrary, the French press still clings to the belief that the United States Government is preparing to make a grand debt-cancellation gesture in the near future.

BERLIN, June 18.—Virtually ignoring the new "indeterminate moratorium" granted Germany on all reparation payments by the "big five" of the Lausanne conference yesterday, the German press to-day almost unanimously attacked Premier Herriot, of France, for blocking the Reich's demands for complete cancellation.

[From the Washington Herald of June 17, 1932]

DEBT DELEGATES AGREE ON EXTENSION FOR REICH

LAUSANNE, June 16.—A majority of the delegates to the Lausanne conference were understood to-night to have agreed to offer a project for suspension of the next reparations payment by Germany.

The project will be in the form of a resolution to be presented to-morrow at a private session of the conference, which Prime Minister J. Ramsay MacDonald opened to-day with a warning that speed is necessary to avert a catastrophe.

The delegates were said to have initialed the agreement to present the suspension project, which does not set a specific date for the termination of the period of suspension.

The resolution will provide for suspension until the conference has reached a decision affecting future payments. The next reparations transfer to the Bank for International Settlements is due July 15, after the expiration of the Hoover moratorium year.

LAUSANNE, June 16.—Prime Minister J. Ramsay MacDonald, of Great Britain, opening the Lausanne reparations conference as president, to-day deftly deposited Europe's economic troubles in Washington's lap and arranged a compromise likely to stave off Germany's demand for complete cancellation of reparations.

The compromise, acceptable to Premier Edouard Herriot, of France, proposes that Germany will hereafter not be forced to continue payments on the "nonpostponable" portion of annuities to the Bank for International Settlements, which payments have been reloaned to the Reich.

Britain's Premier is expected to offer the proposal at to-morrow's secret meeting of the "Big Six," when Chancellor von Papen is expected to demand cancellation.

MacDonald, at the opening session to-day, bluntly implied Europe can not settle her troubles without aid from Washington.

AID TO CROP PLANTING

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 263 from the Committee on Rules, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of S. 4780, as amended by the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House, a bill to provide that advances under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act may be made for crop planting or crop cultivation, including summer fallowing during year 1932.

After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, this is a rule for the consideration of S. 4780, to provide that advances under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act may be made for crop planting or crop cultivation, including summer fallowing, during the year 1932, as amended by the House Committee on Banking and Currency. This provides also for advances for livestock and poultry. How much time does the gentleman from Indiana desire?

Mr. PURNELL. I suggest to the gentleman that he yield me some time, and I shall try to get along without using any of it. I am willing to have the rule voted on now and adopted.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, this measure covers substantially the same purposes sought to be attained in House Joint Resolution 352, which was introduced by me and favorably reported by the Agricultural Committee which is now pending before the Committee on Rules. However, the pending bill covers the matter only for the year 1932. I believe that House Joint Resolution 352 should be enacted at the next session of Congress. The measure now pending will accomplish the same purpose for this session. The bill reported by the Committee on Agriculture is somewhat broader.

There is one suggestion which I think should be made in respect to this bill, and that is what I wish to call to the attention of the members of the Committee on Banking and Currency. I refer to the second proviso, beginning in line 16 on page 2 of the bill:

Provided further, That the Secretary of Agriculture shall give preference in making such loans or advances to farmers who suffered from crop failures in 1931.

I think that language should be stricken out because the measure as broadened covers more than crop production, and besides that, there have been some crop failures in 1932. I can see no good purpose in that language, and, at the proper time, I shall offer an amendment to take it out. I take this time so that the committee might have a chance to consider my suggestion.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I will support this rule but I shall endeavor to secure an amendment to the resolution under the 5-minute rule. I hope that the gentlemen who are interested in the resolution and in this relief will also recognize that some relief is needed by the municipalities and by the people in large centers. I am willing to give additional power to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. I feel that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation should by this time be able to function smoothly and speedily so as to relieve the conditions in our country. At the time that we advocated the Reconstruction Finance Corporation we were under the impression that we were for a law that would relieve the financial situation of the country, that would relieve not only the railroads and the banks, but the commerce of the Nation. I regret to say that as far as I can learn the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, instead of being a blessing and a help, has been a detriment to business and the well-being of the Nation, and has not improved the existing conditions. Why only recently—during the three days that the Republican convention was being held—five banks were closed in the city of Chicago, one of them yesterday.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I have not the time.

Mr. PURNELL. I shall give the gentleman one minute extra if he will yield.

Mr. SABATH. I yield.

Mr. PURNELL. Before the gentleman passes from that point, surely the gentleman does not contend there is any connection between the Republican National Convention in Chicago and the bank failures that occurred there?

Mr. SABATH. I should have said yesterday and the day before yesterday. No; I do not charge the Republican convention as being responsible for the closing of these banks. But what I do say is that Republican policy is responsible for these failures.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. The Democratic National Convention is going to be held there, and it is, perhaps, for that reason that they are closing up. If the Reconstruction Finance Corporation will continue to play into the hands of the few large banks, it may be instrumental in closing all of the small and outlying banks long before the Democratic convention is held.

Mr. SABATH. Instead of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation making the assets liquid, it has frozen them, and it has centralized its activities in such a manner that it is a detriment to the business of this country rather than a benefit or an aid.

I feel that there is an understanding between some of the big bankers of this country and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Some of the small banks have had loans from the large banks. The small banks had reason to believe that the corporation would aid them; consequently, they made applications for loans and, in a majority of instances, were assured that the loans which they applied for would be granted. But almost invariably the amounts were reduced 25 to 50 per cent—approximately the amounts owed by the small banks to the large banking institutions. Naturally enough, the loans secured from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation were paid over to the large banks, and after these banks had been paid up, the small institutions or outlying banks were left in a worse position than they were in before obtaining the loans from the corporation.

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation, which was organized to aid all banks, has in reality proved to be relief for the large banks, because these banks have in almost every case called their loans from the small banks the moment the latter obtained loans from the corporation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois two additional minutes.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I feel that something must be done to restore the credit and aid financial conditions in the United States. I fear that under the present management of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation relief is not forthcoming and that it is not carrying out the will of Congress. It is not doing what you and I believed it would do when we created that institution.

Conditions are serious, and, I repeat, something must be done. We were under the impression that the men in charge would extend and rediscount loans in such a way as to enlarge the credit of the business of this Nation. Instead of that they have contracted it.

Now, we are appealing and will continue to appeal for relief for municipalities. Conditions in the urban centers are serious, and we will offer an amendment to this bill so that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation will be authorized to make loans to municipalities where loans are absolutely needed and where those municipalities can give good security.

That relief is needed, and I appeal to you and ask that you aid us in adopting that amendment authorizing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to grant direct loans to municipalities. This morning I have again received telegrams from the officials and the outstanding citizens of Chicago appealing to Congress to make possible the granting of loans to the States and municipalities; and inasmuch as the provisions in my bill restricted the loans to such municipalities by calling for a guarantee and an assurance of repayment, I feel that it is our duty to comply with these urgent appeals and requests.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. If I had the time I would gladly yield, but my time has expired.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (S. 4780) to provide that advances under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation may be made for crop planting or crop cultivation, including summer-fallowing, during the year 1932, as amended by the House.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 4780, as amended by the House, with Mr. RAYBURN in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the first reading of the bill will be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, this is a Senate bill, amended by the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House of Representatives. The purpose of the measure is to make clear the legislative intention respecting the provisions of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act, which provided for the allocation of funds to the Department of Agriculture, to be loaned by the Secretary of Agriculture for crop production during the year 1932, wherever a situation might be found as the result of which farmers were unable to obtain loans or advances for crop production during that period. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation allocated $200,000,000 to be used for that purpose. This provision was the outgrowth of an amendment offered by the able champion of agriculture, the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

The Secretary of Agriculture has construed the language of the original bill to apply only to crops to be grown and marketed during the year 1932. It seems he based his calculations, in the main, upon cotton and wheat.

A situation has arisen which makes it necessary that we amend the bill to make plain and to insure the carrying out of the legislative purpose, unless we are to permit the benefits of the legislation to be so restricted that only a minor portion of the agricultural interests of the country may be permitted to share in those benefits.

The larger part of the farm products of the country consists of livestock and livestock products, but under the ruling of the Secretary of Agriculture no loans may be made out of the funds allocated to him for livestock raising. No loans, under his interpretation, may be made upon crops to be planted and cultivated during the year 1932 unless they mature and become ready for market during the year 1932.

Mr. HOPE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. In a moment.

So that what we have undertaken to do is to make clear the thought and purpose, which I am sure all Members of Congress had in the passage of the law. That purpose was that the benefits of the legislation should go to all classes of farmers everywhere, who found themselves in need of the provisions of the legislation.

All the farm organizations favor the amendments provided in the bill before us. The Senate passed a measure providing for loans to be used in crop planting and crop cultivation. The distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS], alert as he always is in the interest of the farmers in his district and of the country, some time back introduced a bill extendng the benefits of the provisions of the original Reconstruction Finance Corporation act to livestock farmers; and the gentleman from Montana [Mr. LEAVITT] introduced an amendment similar to the one introduced in the Senate, covering summer fallowing.

My distinguished colleague the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HILL] had a situation which called for relief for truck growers and other farmers in his district and in sections of Alabama which were not permitted under the restricted interpretation imposed by the Secretary of Agriculture to share in the funds allocated to him. So, we took the Senate bill and added the language expressed in the measure offered by the gentleman from Tennessee along with the language employed in the measure introduced by the gentleman from Alabama. The measure, as amended, applies not only to crop production, crop planting, crop cultivation, but to livestock, poultry, and for summer fallowing and there can be no misinterpretation of the purposes of Congress to have the Secretary of Agriculture so apply the loans made by him out of the funds allocated for his department from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation funds so that the benefits will extend to all classes of farmers throughout the country.

I now yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE].

Mr. HOPE. I want the gentleman's opinion on the language of the bill providing for crop planting and crop cultivation in the year 1932. Does the gentleman construe this language to mean that loans will be authorized for the planting of winter wheat which would be planted in the fall of 1932 and harvested in the summer of 1933?

Mr. STEAGALL. That is the very question that arose, and the Secretary of Agriculture construed the language "crop production during the year 1932" to mean crops produced and harvested or prepared for market during the year 1932.

Evidently it was the purpose of Congress that loans should be made to farmers to carry on their regular normal farming activities for the year 1932 regardless of whether or not the crops matured during that year.

Mr. JENKINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield.

Mr. JENKINS. Can the gentleman tell me whether or not under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation law as it stands now and in the provisions of the bill before us, provision is made for loans to orchardists?

Mr. STEAGALL. This bill now under consideration accomplishes that particular thing, and that is one of its specific purposes.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. GILCHRIST. I recently came back from Iowa. I learned that farmers out there can not get sufficient money to vaccinate their hogs. I see the bill covers livestock production. I am glad to hear the chairman of the committee say it is to be applied to all industry in respect to livestock production.

Would the gentleman construe this language to mean, or to include, the vaccination of hogs as a part of livestock production?

Mr. STEAGALL. I think, unquestionably, a farmer in the situation to which the gentleman refers, would have the right to apply for and receive a loan and to expend it for the purpose indicated.

Mr. GILCHRIST. I thank the gentleman. I supposed it so meant.

Mr. HOPE. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield for a further question.

Mr. HOPE. This bill and the original bill provide that a preference shall be given in making these loans and advances to farmers who suffered from crop failures in 1931.

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes; but I will say to the gentleman from Kansas there is not anything in that connection now to give us any concern for the reason that the funds allocated to the Secretary of Agriculture amount to $200,000,000, and the Secretary up to this time has only used something near $65,000,000. So the Secretary has not encountered any difficulty at the point to which the gentleman refers. There has not arisen any situation requiring exercise of preference.

Mr. HOPE. The particular point I have in mind is that some farmers, particularly as to the winter wheat crop in many sections of the country have suffered a failure of the winter wheat crop in 1932.

Would the gentleman have any objection to an amendment providing that those farmers also should have this preference?

Mr. STEAGALL. I may say to the gentleman that I do not see any necessity for anticipating difficulties in that connection in view of the fact the Secretary of Agriculture has ample funds, as the transactions down to this date indicate, without undertaking to discriminate as between classes that are entitled to the relief.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I am pleased to yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Under the interpretation placed upon this bill by the chairman of the committee, is it not a bill to increase the excess production which is now lowering prices on various farm products?

Mr. STEAGALL. I do not think so. These livestock people have their farms; they have their families; they have got to live; and where they were afflicted by drought and find themselves without any opportunity to obtain advances for the operation of their farms they are entitled to relief which will enable them at least to carry on their farming operations to produce crops for the support of their families.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. But it will result in the lowering of prices of those products for all engaged in the business.

Mr. STEAGALL. If the gentleman wants me to enter into a discussion of that, I will have to decline for the reason that I have not sufficient time, but I will say this: I have never yet understood how any sane man could lose sleep over the fear that people are going to work and produce an abundance of the necessaries of life. We are working on the wrong end of the problems that confront us when we undertake to treat bountiful harvests, happy seasons, and fruitful soil as a curse to mankind. That is not where our troubles come from, and we will never solve them if we approach them from that angle. The world needs all we can produce from our fields or factories and will consume all we can produce, if only employment is afforded at wages that will enable mankind to live on standards worthy of a great civilization. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, this is a very important bill, and it is a real emergency measure. I certainly appreciate the sympathetic consideration and cooperation of the Committee on Banking and Currency and the Committee on Rules in reporting out and bringing this bill up.

As you will all recall, section 2 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act sets aside $50,000,000, which may be expanded into $200,000,000, for direct loans to farmers for crop production in the year 1932, preference to be given to those areas where they had suffered from the drought. After this act became a law the Secretary of Agriculture issued regulations in which it was apparent that his construction of the law only permitted loans for the production of growing crops, to be secured by liens upon those growing crops, and the liens to be paid out of those crops when marketed. In his regulations he expressly precluded all loans for livestock or livestock production of any kind except for the purchase of feed for the work stock engaged in growing crops. That left entirely out of consideration loans for more than 60 per cent of the farmers of the United States, because the census reports show that more than 60 per cent of all farm production in the United States consists of livestock and livestock products. Livestock raisers and dairymen suffered just as much from the drought and they are suffering just as much from low prices as any other class of farmers. During the drought their pastures dried up; they were unable to grow feed for their stock for the winter or otherwise, and they have been left in a deplorable situation.

For years and years the Department of Agriculture and all farm experts have very properly been admonishing farmers to engage in diversified farming operations, to not rely upon cotton or wheat or any other one crop, but to grow a certain amount of livestock and other products. A large number of farmers are doing that, but under the interpretation placed upon this act they are not entitled to any loans whatever.

As already stated by the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency [Mr. STEAGALL], they have only loaned less than $65,000,000 out of the $200,000,000 made available and have stopped making loans for growing crops during this year because there is no further need for such loans.

This is a very important matter. The interpretation made by the Secretary of Agriculture has caused a great deal of dissatisfaction among that large class of farmers who are engaged either exclusively or partially in livestock raising and in dairying, together with a large class of farmers who desire to plant crops and prepare for crops during the year 1932, but which crops are not to be marketed until 1933. They are also left out under the interpretation of the act. I am not discussing whether the interpretation is correct or not. I think it is a strained construction, but it is the construction, and can only be remedied by this very simple bill, which makes this fund available for all classes of farmers who deserve it and who can give the security which is satisfactory to the Secretary of Agriculture. [Applause.]

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. LEAVITT].

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Chairman, there is contained in this bill, as has been stated by the chairman of the committee [Mr. STEAGALL], a provision to allow loans for what is known as summer fallowing, a method of cultivation used in a number of the Western and Northwestern States. It has been said in the debate that it was the original intention of section 2 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act that loans should be available for all the necessary farming operations of 1932. I am convinced it was not intended by the Congress that those loans should be confined only to those farming operations to produce crops that would be harvested in the year 1932. But that interpretation has necessarily been made by the Secretary of Agriculture because of the wording of the act, and that has precluded the making of loans for one of the most important parts of the farming operations of some of the States, known as summer fallowing.

In order to meet that situation, I introduced a bill on the 19th of February that was entitled:

H. R. 9538. A bill for the relief of agriculturists using the summer-fallow method of farming.

The language of that bill has been practically incorporated in this bill which is now before us. The Secretary of Agriculture reported on my bill, and in his statement referring to it he said:

The proposed bill is in the nature of an amendment to section 2 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act, approved January 22, 1932, and purports to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to make loans to farmers for summer fallowing during the calendar year 1932. Under the provisions of section 2, as approved, loans are limited to crop production purposes during the year 1932. The department has received a number of requests for summer-fallowing loans, but it has been necessary to advise the applicants, or the inquirers, as the case may be, that there is no authority under existing legislation to make loans for that purpose. If loans are made for the purpose of summer fallowing, they will be made largely in the following States: South Dakota, North Dakota, Montana, Wyoming, Idaho, Utah, Washington, Oregon, California, Nebraska, and Colorado.

The summer-fallow process is necessary to the agriculture of these sections because of the uncertainty of moisture from year to year. It is necessary to prepare a portion of the soil in such a way that it will conserve whatever moisture is available, and make it available again for the production of the crop in the following year.

This bill, therefore, so far as the summer-fallowing feature is concerned, has a favorable report from the Secretary of Agriculture. This principle of recognizing summer fallowing has been included in previous laws authorizing loans to the farmers of that section of the country, and provision for summer-fallow loans has been included. I appreciate the cooperation of the Banking Committee and its chairman in incorporating the provisions of my bill in this Senate bill now before us, in order that it may become law at this session and be immediately beneficial. This bill should have the support of the House.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HILL].

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, there is apparently no opposition to this bill, and there should be none. The chairman of the committee [Mr. STEAGALL], and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS], have thoroughly explained the provisions of the bill. I do not know that a great deal can be added to their explanation. I want to thank Mr. STEAGALL for his splendid efforts in behalf of the bill. Mr. DAVIS has been indefatigable in his labors for the bill and but for his tireless and persistent work the loans provided in the bill for livestock, dairy, and poultry farmers would not have been included. I call the attention of the committee to the fact that the bill has the unqualified approval of the American Farm Bureau Federation, the National Dairy Union, the National Grange, the Holstein-Friesian Association of America, and various other agricultural and livestock organizations; in fact representatives from the Farm Bureau Federation, the Dairy Union, and the Grange appeared at the hearing on the bill before the Banking and Currency Committee and urged its passage.

As has been stated in the debate, under the rulings of the Secretary of Agriculture, for a farmer to secure any of the money provided in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act, he must show that the money is not only going to be used for crop production, but he must show further that the crop will mature and be ready for market during the year 1932, and that any lien on the crop can be paid off during the year 1932.

Mr. JENKINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. JENKINS. Does the gentleman know whether or not the department, in interpreting this proposition of crop production, includes the crops of orchardists?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I will say that under the interpretation of the Secretary of Agriculture the orchardist would not be able to borrow any money under the original act, but under the bill now pending there would be no question but that the orchardist could come in and borrow money for the planting of any crop or for the cultivation of any crop or for anything relating to the production of any crop.

Mr. JENKINS. What makes the gentleman think that under this amendment the words "crop production" would be interpreted to include orchardists, if they did not include them in the original bill? It is the same language.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. For the reason, I will say to the gentleman, that the amended bill carries these words "or for crop planting or crop cultivation."

Mr. JENKINS. Yes; but the question is whether the product of the orchard is a crop, or does this language mean products of the soil, such as corn, wheat, cotton, and so forth?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I would say that, clearly, under "crop cultivation" the orchardist would come in.

Mr. JENKINS. But the gentleman does not know that positively?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Of course, I could not speak for the Secretary of Agriculture, but I do give the gentleman my conviction based on a knowledge of the facts.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. I would like to ask the gentleman the same question that I asked the chairman of the committee, Mr. STEAGALL. Is not this a bill to encourage an excess of production when we are already overproduced?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. No; this bill is simply to give the benefits of the original act to all the farmers, whether their crops mature in 1932 or whether they mature after 1932.

Mr. HOPE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. HOPE. Is it not the fact that under the regulations of the Department of Agriculture in making these loans, overproduction is actually discouraged because they limit the amount that a man can grow?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. The gentleman is absolutely right. Instead of being an incentive to overproduce, there is an incentive not to produce so much.

There are a number of crops, such as the strawberry crop, which is produced in my district in south central Alabama which does not mature in the calendar year in which it is planted. This crop is planted in August and it has to be cultivated from August until it matures along in the following spring, about March or April. Under the present ruling of the Secretary of Agriculture the producers of such a crop can secure no funds and no benefits whatever under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act. What the bill would do would be to permit the strawberry growers to borrow money for the planting of their crop, for the cultivation of their crop, or for anything connected with the production of their crop. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY].

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, those of us who voted for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act will support this measure as a matter of course. It was understood that the terms of the original bill provided for loans to livestock producers and dairy farmers. Since they are excluded by interpretation, it becomes necessary to include them through this amendment.

I want to emphasize, however, that these loans to agricultural producers will be of no real value unless we take more fundamental action. This whole plan of advancing money to farmers and taking chattel mortgages on their products will prove futile as long as purchasing power in the great industrial districts is curtailed as at present.

With prices falling as they have for the past two years, it is possible that all the poultry and livestock, all the orchard crops and dairy products, produced as a result of these loans, will be sold for less than the amount of money loaned. Under such conditions these funds advanced will be gifts rather than loans, for the entire production can not provide repayment.

Can we not see that these measures will be of no benefit until we act to help restore the buying power of Americans?

In the Pittsburgh district more than a hundred thousand competent, willing workers are idle. In all, some 10,000,000 Americans are without employment. They have no income and no purchasing power. They and their families need these agricultural products covered in this bill and would gladly pay a fair price for them, but the breakdown in our industrial system has left them helpless and poverty stricken.

We have heard much of these so-called bonus marchers who have descended upon the Capitol from every corner of the Nation. Why are they here? Because they are out of work! If they were employed, you would hear no plea for payment of the bonus.

One of these stalwart American soldiers told me his tragic story in my office last night. He is one of my constituents, and I have known him for many years. He is a competent electrician and has always been a faithful worker and was never discharged for cause in his life. He spent two years overseas during the World War and had an honorable record. He returned home and resumed work in the steel mills. He married and has three children. During all of 1931 he had five weeks' work. His grocery bills could not be paid, and he could not meet his rent. At last he was forced to apply for charity, and for months he and his family have been existing on the miserable allowance of $1.08 a week.

Think of that, Mr. Chairman! Five American citizens, the family of a soldier, forced to live on $1.08 a week. He should be making forty times that amount by his trained ability to produce wealth.

Until we act to help restore that soldier and others like him to productive employment all bills like this one under consideration will be only as effective as putting sticking plaster on a cancer.

Let us realize the real disease that is before us for remedy and not content ourselves with treating symptoms.

Mr. Chairman, no one can emphasize the gravity of the situation more forcibly than Justice Brandeis and Justice Stone, of the United States Supreme Court, have done in their opinion of March 21, 1932, in connection with the New State Ice Co. case, No. 563, October term, 1931. Here is what they said:

> The people of the United States are now confronted with an emergency more serious than war. Misery is widespread in a time not of scarcity but of overabundance. The long-continued depression has brought unprecedented unemployment, a catastrophic fall in commodity prices, and a volume of economic losses which threatens our financial institutions. Some people believe that the existing conditions threaten even the stability of the capitalistic system.

Paul M. Mazur, associated with the banking house of Lehman Bros., New York, said in his recent book, New Roads to Prosperity:

> Capitalism is unquestionably on trial. None of us who are advocates of capitalism can lightly disregard the disaster that has befallen the world.

Dr. W. B. Donham, of Harvard University, in his recent book "Business Adrift" after reviewing the difficulties confronting us, concludes:

> Not only is the present unemployment emergency more serious than any previous emergency but my whole study of the future of American business indicates that it will require the wisest immediate management by both business and Government to prevent it from turning into a permanent problem of major significance. If something is not done which changes the situation, we may well be facing an immediate major breakdown of capitalism.

Owen D. Young, in an interview printed in the Baltimore Sun on May 18, urges liberal Government aid as a necessity at the present time, and comments on such a policy as follows:

> Do I like this idea of the Government making the start by setting up a credit bridge by which idle material may pass over into new undertakings? Of course I do not. I have spent my life in private business and I have believed that private business could operate the great machine by which our labor and our materials are exchanged and converted into things of use for all of us.
> But I am not willing to sit idly by, my hands in my lap, when things crumble and crumble and crumble and finally the point is reached where further crumbling may cause such disaster as this Nation has never known.
> If we are too confused and too terrified to act individually, then I say close up ranks and act as a body—which is what happens when the Government steps in.

Daniel Willard, president of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, another of America's foremost capitalists, in an address at the University of Pennsylvania, said:

> A system—call it what you will—under which it is possible for five or six millions of willing and able-bodied men to be out of work and unable to secure work for months at a time, and with no other source of income, can not be said to be perfect or even satisfactory. * * * A second problem is bound up closely with the first: The United States is perhaps the richest country in the world in natural and humanistic resources. * * * We have a productive capacity in our mills and factories far beyond our own domestic requirements. At the same time, with all this surplus of wealth and resources, we have millions, so it is said, in dire need of food and clothing. In short, more of everything to eat and wear than we can possibly use—and millions of human beings hungry and cold. These two problems together—unemployment and the distribution of resources—bring into question the very foundations of our political and economic system.

THE MONEY COST OF THIS BREAKDOWN

Mr. Chairman, what are the facts which have led to such statements by leaders who can not be termed alarmists?

Our national wealth in July, 1929, was estimated at between three hundred and fifty and four hundred billion dollars.

To October, 1931, alone, securities listed in the New York Stock Exchange had depreciated sixty billions.

Stocks and bonds not so listed had depreciated twenty-five billions.

Real estate, personal property, and small business had suffered a loss of fifty billions.

The loss in wealth which was caused when the army of unemployed had no chance to add manufactured value to raw materials amounted to fifty billions.

This staggering total of one hundred and eighty-five billions is the loss of national wealth due to the depression.

For the two years 1930 and 1931 the loss in wages due to unemployment was $21,600,000,000.

The estimated loss in income to salaried managers and small business men was $9,000,000,000. The loss in rentals was $4,000,000,000 and the loss in corporation earnings and dividends was $9,000,000,000. The total loss in income for the two years was $43,600,000,000, or an annual loss of $21,800,000,000.

To-day 10,000,000 workers are unemployed and 40,000,000 Americans are in the trenches suffering from privation and want.

It is conservative to say that for every month of 1932 we have lost $2,000,000,000, and will continue that loss for every month present conditions continue.

STABILIZING POVERTY AND MISERY

Mr. Chairman, in the face of such a desperate situation there are those who counsel further deflation to a point which in fact means stabilized poverty and misery. They say that the way out of the present economic morass is by reducing standards of living. They say we have been extravagant as a nation, and that the golden age is past. They argue for wage reductions in public employment and in private industry. They preach the gospel of thrift which pinches every penny and of saving which holds fast to every dollar.

Exponents of that policy in Congress vociferously protest against governmental action aimed to directly increase employment and maintain wage standards. My mail and the mail of every Member is loaded down with letters on embossed stationery demanding drastic reductions in American standards.

The end of the road thus advised is well expressed by the Business Conditions Weekly, published in New York City, in its issue of May 7, 1932:

> There is no need to fear, however, that these problems will not eventually be solved, although it is obvious that their complete solution will require a long period of time. Government expenditures will be finally reduced either through the actual failure of the needed receipts to materialize or because of the people's opposition to the payment of the taxes demanded and the replacement of present officials by men willing and capable to institute the necessary economies. The steadily declining demand for finished goods will ultimately force down prices to a level within the means of consumers. The excessive production or raw materials will sooner or later be eliminated by the cost factor. The consequent rise in raw-material prices, together with the drop in finished-goods prices, will restore the needed price equilibrium. Foreclosures, bankruptcies, repudiations, reorganizations, the scaling down of debts by creditors and the gradual repayment of debts will eventually restore the debt burden to normal proportions.

Mr. Chairman, is that not a black picture? Yet, I submit, it is the sure goal if the road to further deflation is followed.

It means that we must scrap all the gains of science and invention and education for the past 50 years because we do not have intelligence enough to organize and use the wealth-producing facilities already built and ready to our hand. If we accept this course, it will not be because of a poverty of goods but because of a poverty of intelligence.

WAGE CUTS RETARD RECOVERY

We have witnessed the results of brutal deflation. Wage cuts have been made and unemployment has increased. They have not helped but delayed recovery. I do not say that they have not been necessary in many cases, for when demand falls off expenses must come down. A single company can not long continue in business if its expenses exceed its income.

However, good wages are at the bottom of good business. Let us admit that when the railroads, the United States Steel Corporation, and other business enterprises cut the wages of their workers, their action, however necessary, means injury to the public welfare, since it decreases purchasing power and reduces living standards.

If that truth is realized the real meaning of wage cuts by the United States Government will be understood. The hysterical outcry for the slashing of the very moderate wages of Government workers is part of a program to beat down all wage standards to pre-war levels. Such action leads to further cuts in private industry with all the tragic results of such a policy.

Those who have been so loud in their demands for governmental wage cuts are the deflationists who selfishly believe their own interests require a lower standard of living in every American home. The fact is that every wage cut, whether by Government or private industry, helps to perpetuate this depression. Instead of wages in general being too high in 1929, there were too low, and the country would have escaped much of its recent suffering if a greater part of corporate surpluses had been distributed in the form of higher wages. Between 1923 and 1928 wages increased about 1 per cent a year, production increased 4 per cent a year, and profits increased 9 per cent a year.

That fatal lack of balance had a great share in bringing us to the point where the income of the consuming millions would not permit the purchase of the products of the factories.

I say again that although wage cutting in individual cases may be a means of self-preservation, for business as a whole it is a step downward, which must be retraced at the earliest moment possible.

There is a road out of this jungle. We must move upward toward higher standards of living. I stand against these defeatists and deflationists who try to arrogate to themselves all patriotism in their denunciation of those who fight for the happiness of the many and not the few.

That is an old, old practice. Their spiritual ancestors were defeatists in the darkest days of the Civil War. They denounced Lincoln's plans and impugned his motives, pointing out that the opposite course could alone save the Union. Lincoln replied by sending a pledge in three sections which he asked his correspondents to sign.

Lincoln's pledge might well be paraphrased and sent to these present-day defeatists somewhat as follows:

(1) That there is now such unemployment in the United States that its tendency is to destroy the National Union and that in your opinion any constitutional means should be used in meeting this danger.

(2) That no one of you will do anything which will tend to hinder our efforts or lessen the efficiency of Government and industry while engaged in the effort to conquer unemployment.

(3) That each of you will, in his sphere, do all he can to have American workers, while engaged in the effort to suppress this evil, fed, clad, and otherwise provided for and supported.

OLD SLOGANS ARE USELESS

Mr. Chairman, every man here knows that millions are in want, but not because we can not produce the things they need. I will not believe that we must stabilize poverty when we can produce enough wealth to stabilize prosperity.

These advocates of further deflation are harking back to nineteenth century conditions, before science had remade the world, covered the continent with factories, and tied the Nation together by train, automobile, and airplane. Then it was necessary to save and sacrifice so that factories might be built. Now it is necessary to spend so that the products of those factories can be consumed. This country was not extravagant in 1928 and 1929. It was not living beyond its means. It was not using the products created by its own labor. There were surpluses in every line of production, proving that our standards of living were not high enough. With a proper standard for 120,000,000 Americans there would have been no such maladjustment between production and consumption.

I answer the question "Must America be poor?" with an emphatic "No!" I contend that a sane leadership can bring us to greater prosperity than we have ever known and that the road to that goal lies straight ahead.

It will take deliberate action, however. This fatalistic confidence that America will come out of this crisis without intelligent and determined direction means destruction. We can not stand still any more than an airplane pilot can remain stationary 5,000 feet in the air.

We can not hope to get out of this crisis simply through bolstering up the assets of banks. I voted for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the Glass-Steagall bank bill, and the home-loan discount bank bill, and I am voting for this amendment to-day as measures which will keep us from sinking deeper but which assuredly can not lift us out of the Slough of Despond.

Constructive action is necessary. Everybody knows we have productive equipment sufficient to supply our 120,000,000 with everything they need. But many of these mills are idle and willing workers are unemployed while they and their dependents are being forced to seek the aid of charity. Our great agricultural districts are in deepest distress because wheat, cotton, corn, and other products are being sold at less than it costs to produce them. The coal, oil, copper, and other great basic industries are depressed almost to the point of ruin. There is an unprecedented deficit in the United States Treasury, and new and strange tax burdens have been enacted.

THE PROBLEM OF PLENTY

What shall we do? First of all, what is it we want? If we can decide the goal, we may then decide the path to pursue.

It is not extreme to say that every American should have food, clothing, and shelter as the basic requirements. Then there should be education and recreation for all of us, with provision for hospitals and other public agencies of helpfulness.

Our problem is the problem of plenty. Productive capacity was expanded until at the peak of consumption in 1929 almost every industry was capable of producing from 30 per cent to 100 per cent more than was consumed. This production was achieved with fewer and fewer workers. In 1910, with a population of 90,000,000, we had 38,000,000 wage earners. At the same rate of production there should have been 51,000,000 wage earners to supply 120,000,000 people in 1930. As a matter of fact, due to increased efficiency in production, about 34,000,000 workers in 1930 would have produced for 120,000,000 people consuming at the same rate as the 90,000,000 consumed in 1910. Higher standards made work for about 40,000,000 workers where 48,000,000 were asking for a chance to work.

The loss of this purchasing power meant lower volume of business. Cut-throat competition ensued, in which sales regardless of prices became the goal. Soon profits dried up, equipment industries came to a standstill, and labor was discharged. As purchasing power decreased other workers were thrown out of work, and the destructive downward spiral began and has continued to this day.

The majority of American industries are now operating at half capacity and the labor employed is on part-time schedule, still further cutting down purchasing power.

Mr. Chairman, is it not clear that the crisis is like that to which Abraham Lincoln referred in his speech in Pittsburgh, February 15, 1861, when he was on his way to the Capital? "In plain words," he declared, "there is really no crisis except an artificial one."

To-day we must say that this is a man-made depression. No act of God brought this catastrophy. There has been no fire or earthquake or flood. There has been utter disregard of the spiritual values of life, while we blindly worshipped the god of the machine.

What is to be done?

First, there should be immediate relief for those who are suffering most from this collapse of our economic order.

IMMEDIATE HELP FOR HUNGRY

I believe the United States Government should help unemployed Americans and their families. Private charity can not carry the load. Public funds in many States and counties and cities are exhausted and the need grows greater. The last resort, national help, must deal with the national problem.

Denunciation of Federal assistance is not an American answer to that tragic question, "How shall I keep my wife and children alive?" which a vast army of honest workers are asking to-day.

No man who has never faced that question himself has any right to sneer at such desperately driven Americans. No theory of local and State responsibility should chain down the helping hand of the National Government. No fear of establishing a precedent should prevent action in an unprecedented situation.

I know western Pennsylvania and its needs. There is the one-time workshop of the world, where workers produced untold wealth out of mines and mills. To-day those workers are jobless and hungry.

I know employers who have faced bankruptcy in order to keep old and faithful employees on the pay roll. I know merchants who have extended credit to friends and neighbors until they were destroyed themselves. I know citizens who have contributed to relief funds to a greater degree than they could afford in justice to themselves. I know public officials who have obligated themselves in order to get money for an empty treasury.

Still, with such sacrifices which bleed industrial communities white, the need for help grows greater. It is folly to delay action while men grow reckless and desperate. Let the United States answer the cries of distress from its own citizens now as it has answered similar cries from other peoples in the past.

PUBLIC-BUILDING PROGRAM

The next stage in relief should be a public-building program. The socially sound and productive remedy for unemployment is work. Charity is no true answer, but pay envelopes are the basis of prosperity. The cost will be far less than that of prolonged bad business.

Private industry can not furnish employment to-day, for it can not increase its receipts or its borrowings. The United States Government can set the wheels of increased employment in motion through a comprehensive program of public works large enough to strike a real blow at this depression.

I believe bonds should be issued now for construction just as was done in war time for destruction.

Besides the direct action by the United States Government in the construction of its own public works, loans to States and cities should be made through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

The President's organization on unemployment relief listed many worthy projects which can be erected now, such as waterworks, sewers, bridges, tunnels, roads and street paving, grade-crossing elimination, buildings, parks, air ports, and so forth.

It is estimated that $2,000,000,000 worth of State, county, and municipal construction, originally planned for 1931, has not been undertaken. New projects for 1932 add another billion. That shows that these necessary public works now ready to go forward during 1932 amount to $3,000,000,000.

Without the help of the Federal Government this great building program will be dropped just at the time it is needed most. A great building program will increase purchasing power and will add to the wealth of the Nation.

There is an outcry against public works on account of the Budget. It is important that the Budget be balanced, mainly because so much emphasis has been laid upon it that failure will affect public confidence. We did not balance the Budget in 1917 or 1918 and no one expected it. To-day it becomes necessary, and in order to do it a great many Members, like myself, voted for a 50 per cent increase in the letter-postage rates and other taxes, which were inherently unjustifiable.

However, expenditures for public works are not current expenses but capital investments, outside the Budget for the year. No industry in the world counts its factory construction as current expenses.

It is true that there would be an annual charge due to interest on bonds and to provide a sinking fund. But millions of workers could be put to work through the use of these funds.

A program of building on the line I have described would so stimulate business that the recovery in values would pay the entire cost many times over. Revived industry could pay the increased amount without any addition whatever to present tax rates.

We can balance the Budget on paper, but actual balancing depends on revenues actually received. Give the workers a chance to balance their budgets and the Treasury's problem will be solved.

Everywhere we hear the plea, "Give us confidence and all will be well."

My friends, confidence depends upon the assurance of an upward trend in employment and prices and sales. Factories have no stocks on hands, and a million and a half retail establishments buy from hand to mouth. The normal replacement of automobiles would have required 3,000,000 cars which have not yet been bought. In 1931 fewer automobiles were sold than went to the junk yard. More badly worn tires are on cars than ever before. Railroads are not buying rails or rolling stock. Why should they buy if prices are likely to be lower next week or next month? What a tidal wave of business would follow the assurance that prices would not be lower but higher next week or next month.

The Federal Reserve Board has been buying Government securities in large amounts with a view to increasing the supply of currency and thus increasing the price level. The Goldsborough bill has for its purpose the continuance of that work until prices have reached the 1926 level.

However, experience thus far proves that an addition to the currency does not necessarily raise prices. It must be in circulation if it is to be effective. If it is hoarded in the banks, there can be no beneficial results.

CONTROL OF PRODUCTION NECESSARY

In any case, there can be no stabilization of prices without stabilized production. No currency control will help industry if producers insist on dumping excess production on the market under a system of blind and senseless cutthroat competition.

Therefore, if we are to win the war against this depression, there must be a way found to correct the evils of excess productive capacity. Furnishing food for the hungry, even creating public work for the unemployed, is like taking care of the wounded on the battlefield. Such action alone never yet won a battle.

If we are to have permanent prosperity, there must be such organization of our industrial system that able and willing workers may have jobs through which they may earn an honest livelihood for themselves and their families.

There is no other way to do that except by controlled production so that output may be balanced by purchasing power.

Control of production means the destruction of the false doctrine that cutthroat competition is the life of trade. The fact is that such competition is the destruction of trade and the destruction of the peace, security, and happiness of all Americans.

Destructive competition, with the uncontrolled production it engenders, has driven the prices of commodities below production cost. It has dissipated capital and bankrupted business. It has forced wages to a starvation level. It has forced the passing of dividends and has pulled down the value of securities.

We have tried to make stark individualism serve in an age of cooperation. The result is the anarchy of present-day conditions.

Mr. Chairman, I repeat that it is essential that the United States Government help to organize the industrial system of the Nation so that every citizen may have an opportunity to earn a decent living. Without that opportunity a free-born American is in worse condition than under slavery.

Under the system of cutthroat competition there can not be security of employment at fair wages nor security of fair return for invested capital. The way must be found without delay to provide for control of production so that it may be balanced against consumption or our entire capitalistic system is downed.

That does not mean reduced production, but it does mean stabilized production. To secure the proper results of mass production and more efficient processes, the American standard of living must be increased, not decreased. There must be enlarged purchasing power and consumption.

There is no necessity for bringing our standards down to those of foreign countries. Our prosperity does not depend on foreign commerce, and the sooner we realize that the better.

Our home market, in our peak period, was 92 per cent of our trade. With a decent living standard for all, we could have absorbed 100 per cent of our production. Under present conditions we should make this Nation a self-contained country, save only for those special products which we can not produce here.

We have built up enormous credits in foreign countries to our own undoing. They are of no value unless we turn them into commodities and services. And when they are turned into commodities and services which can be produced here, it simply means robbing some Americans of a chance to make a living.

If we would realize that the great problem is to supply continuous work for Americans so that they can be secure and prosperous we would soon see the importance of controlling production to meet the needs of an increasing standard for our own citizens.

Free and unrestrained competition is fatal in an age of big business.

EFFECTS OF CUTTHROAT COMPETITION

Under the pressure of vast capital accumulations, and mass production on a tremendous scale, competition has developed a recklessness and ruthlessness undreamed of by the older economists who spoke so blithely of the beneficent effects of competition. The old doctrine of supply and demand has ceased to function as an automatic stabilizer of production and trade.

Supply has run wild as it were. Vast resources have been put into the building of plants to turn out commodities which either were not wanted at all or could be sold only at a loss. In some cases, whole industries have been carried on at a constant loss, and instead of this resulting in eliminating the inefficient producer, as it should have under the old theories, new capital was constantly entering the field.

This failure of competition properly to operate under modern conditions is very well described in an article by Philip Cabot, professor of utility management in the Harvard Graduate School of Business Administration, in an article in the autumn, 1931, issue of the Yale Review. Referring to the law of supply and demand, Mr. Cabot says:

No informed person will deny that, as a method of controlling demand, this law leaves much to be desired. As a method of controlling supply, it is even worse. The theory is that when many manufacturers are producing goods that compete directly, and when the supply so far exceeds demand that the price falls below the cost of the marginal producer, his production is eliminated, the supply is thereby reduced, prices rise, and prosperity is restored. But unfortunately this does not happen. It is true that when oversupply has brought the price below the cost some producers lose money, but their first thought is not to reduce the supply but to reduce the cost, and in order to do so they increase the supply, which forces the price still lower. When this method fails the corporation employing it fails and the owners succumb, but the plant goes into the hands of the creditors, who often put in new capital and new management, and come into the market as new competing producers on a lower cost level, because most of the fixed costs of plant have disappeared. Thus under modern conditions of free competition and almost unlimited capital, when a large number of competing producers oversupply the market, the law of supply and demand may not operate to correct this condition until the fixed plant has been worn out. In the meantime the oversupply may actually have increased, so that even the low-cost producer can not make a profit. To rely upon this law to prevent overproduction is thus like relying on a stomach pump to prevent overeating. It simply doesn't work.

There is no sure way for a producer to reduce the supply of goods in any manufacturing industry except to buy up the plants of his rivals and scrap the less efficient ones. This method, however, is 'conspiracy in restraint of trade,' and when discovered leads to prosecution. Pooling agreements between the producers, which might reach the same result, are illegal and practically unenforceable.

Thus it seems that the freedom of competition at present required by our law has rendered the law of supply and demand ineffective as a stabilizer. It does not prevent, or modify, the swing of the business cycle. In fact, it may even accentuate it. This is a horrid thought and an almost incredible one. The thing has worked so well in the past that we ask what has gone wrong with it now. The answer is that conditions have changed. The supply of liquid capital in the United States threatens to exceed the demand, and, with invention reduced to a science, new methods of increasing production are now rained upon us. The result is that supply in one field after another outruns demand to such an extent that the price appeal on which the law of supply and demand depends has proved wholly inadequate.

Looking into the future, Mr. Cabot sees absolutely no hope except through some method of controlling unrestrained competition:

In such a situation any generalization, or even opinion, regarding the future is hazardous, but it is none the less necessary to attempt some generalization based on our experience. This much seems clear; the principle of free competition, so serviceable in the past, appears now to have developed vices which threaten to destroy us, for when competition is really free, planning for any considerable future period is a waste of time because the plans can not be carried out. In short, freedom of competition under modern conditions means that the chaos in our industrial world will continue. If stability is to be achieved, some freedom must be surrendered. This is a familiar phenomenon. As the world becomes more crowded the freedom of the individual must be progressively curtailed if he is to preserve any freedom, and it now appears that if capitalism is to survive, some freedom must be sacrificed.

The calamitous result of unrestrained competition has also been vividly presented by Thomas L. Chadbourne, New York attorney, who led in the negotiations for the international sugar pact in 1931. Writing in the New York Times of June 7, 1931, Mr. Chadbourne, after reviewing the particular ills of the sugar industry resulting from cutthroat competition of the most destructive kind, had this to say about present-day competition in general:

The old adage, "Competition is the life of trade," contains a half truth, than which there is nothing more dangerous; but recent developments in the commodity situation of the world indicate that unrestrained competition is likely to be the destruction of society and has opened the eyes of the business world to the necessity of at least tempering this worn-out statement by the addition of one word and making it read in the future, "Enlightened competition is the life of trade."

Enlightenment in a great industry is only obtainable by cooperation, because education of the kind necessary to avoid the serious missteps of over or under production is too expensive to be attainable by the small unit.

The human mind is a powerful lever, and through the history of our capitalistic social structure it has, with self-interest as a fulcrum, lifted immense production loads. Incidentally, during the past two years this lever, with unenlightened self-interest as a fulcrum, has sadly overdone the lifting process in the production of most of the staple commodities.

But self-interest is not the only fulcrum upon which the human mental lever can operate. We see in war time public interest become equally as effective a fulcrum for the lever of production; but the difficulty has always been that self-interest is a continuing interest, while public interest or public service has required the inspiration of national calamity to bring it widely into being, and it fades with the ending of the trouble that inspired it.

Nevertheless, wars—and Heaven knows we have had enough of them, as in 2,500 years of recorded history there have been in this world only 40 years of undiluted peace—have taught us the lesson that people stirred by national spirit will make enormous personal sacrifices for their nations. The world situation which every nation is suffering from now is equal in its ill effects to any war any of the nations has ever had on hand. Millions of men are out of employment throughout the world, and their suffering is longer drawn out and harder to bear than suffering in war time.

Will not this calamitous condition arouse intelligent human beings, equally as much as war, to a necessity for individual sacrifice for the good of all? Will not this calamitous condition instill into the hearts and minds of men the imperative necessity for cooperation just as they have had it when their nations are at war? I know it will at some period. The question is, Can not that time be advanced so as to make the results come quickly enough to save the system under which you and I and our forefathers have lived for so many centuries?

Equally striking is the analysis of our present difficulties by Prof. J. Russell Smith, of Columbia University, writing in the Survey Graphic for July, 1931. The article bears the arresting title "The End of an Epoch." I quote a few sentences from it:

Industrially we are all dressed up with no place to go. We are equipped. We need a market. There is our neighbor's hunger and his near-nakedness. Our next and pressing task is to turn him into a market. To do this we must do something to give him buying power. We are at the end of an epoch—the epoch of free and unrestricted competition. Our system has failed. Six million unemployed prove it. We need a new system.

The name in economic theory of our present industrial system is laissez faire, which means "let alone."

This theory was born in the minds of men who saw industry as a spinning wheel, a hand loom, a cobbler at his bench, a blacksmith at his anvil, a tailor in his shop, a farmer with his scythe, transportation in carts and on horseback, with the canal boat as the great hope. This theory of laissez faire did not work so badly in the first half of the nineteenth century, with new continents being opened up and the young men able to run away from bad employment conditions in cities and settle in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Kansas, Iowa, Nebraska, Dakota, Manitoba, Australia, Siberia, or South Africa. It is different in the age of machinery when the continents are all settled. We now see that with the steam hammer and the giant corporations of the industrial city the liassez faire theory is failing more and more to bring economic satisfaction.

Free competition kills purchasing power. What is free competition between unorganized, hungry unemployed men and a billion-dollar corporation? What is free competition in a glutted market? What is free competition when both labor and capital go hungry, as they do now in the American soft-coal industry?

COMPETITION IN BITUMINOUS COAL

Let us look at the bituminous-coal industry. The evil results of cutthroat competition have nowhere been more definitely described and the need of reform more strongly urged than by President Hoover before the convention of the American Federation of Labor at Boston, October, 1930. Referring to the bituminous-coal industry, President Hoover spoke as follows:

In that industry the encroachments of electrical power, of natural gas, of improvements in consumption have operated to slow down the annual demand from its high peak, leaving a most excessive production capacity.

At the same time the introduction of labor-saving devices has decreased the demand for mine labor. In addition to its other difficulties must be counted the effect of the multitude of 6,000 independent mine owners among 7,000 mines, which has resulted in destructive competition and final breakdown of wages.

All these conditions have culminated in a demoralization of the industry and a depth of human misery in some sections which is wholly out of place in our American system. The situation has been under investigation of our Government departments, by Congress, together with commissions and committees of one sort or another, for the past 10 years. The facts are known.

One key to solution seems to me to lie in reduction of this destructive competition. It certainly is not the purpose of our competitive system that it should produce a competition which destroys stability in an industry and reduces to poverty all those within it. Its purpose is rather to maintain that degree of competition which induces progress and protects the consumer. If our regulatory laws be at fault they should be revised.

Mr. Chairman, note particularly the last sentence of this quotation from the President's address:

If our regulatory laws be at fault, they should be revised.

WASTES IN OIL INDUSTRY

The ills of the oil industry are notorious. Here competition produced some of its most destructive effects and, what is still more striking, has led to efforts, urged by the producers, to control production under public supervision.

The difficulties of the oil industry and the need of public intervention are well set forth in a recent article by Walter C. Teagle, president of the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, in a volume entitled "A Basis for Stability." He says:

Oil is unlike other minerals because it does not remain just where nature stored it until the time it is brought to the surface of the earth. It isn't the least concerned about property lines established by man above ground. It flows toward the wells, wherever they may be, and that is why one producer may recover oil that really belongs to another producer. Usually the courts hold that the producer who first captures oil and gas on the land above the oil pool is entitled to possess that oil and gas, whether it comes from beneath his own land or from beneath the land of another producer. So when land above a pool is owned by many people, many wells are drilled. The oil is brought to the surface regardless of each landowner's right to it, regardless of whether each producer has a market for it, and regardless of dissipation of gas pressures and accelerated intrusion of water, which will result, sooner or later, in placing enormous quantities of the oil beyond hope of recovery. The lawlessness of scramble is reenacted with the development of every new oil field in which there are many landowners who produce on a competitive basis. Each producer wants to be first to capture the oil. Drilling is done feverishly, carelessly, and extravagantly. Yet this is only the beginning of a chain of reckless, extravagant, and unbusinesslike events. As the oil is produced in greater quantities than are required by the market, it is stored at heavy cost above ground. The producer offers it for sale for whatever he can get, and the law of supply and demand is there to see that he does not get much. Refiners are tempted by bargain prices to buy oil in excess of their needs and to make more gasoline than the market demands.

So there is not only overproduction of crude oil but there is overproduction of refined products, too. This, in turn, leads to overexpansion of marketing facilities and to all the evil practices that creep in when marketers have more products on hand than are required to satisfy public needs. The forces that cause instability in the production of crude petroleum lead inevitably to instability in refining and marketing practices.

The ills of the oil industry are peculiar to that industry and require peculiar remedies. These are modification of antitrust laws, cooperation among producers, and the exercise of the police power of the States.

In the case of oil, the movement for regulated production has actually come to fruition and the principle of control has been supported by the United States Supreme Court. I quote from the United States Daily of May 17, 1932:

The Supreme Court of the United States determined on May 16 that a State has the power and authority to limit the production of oil and gas from the wells of the State to the amount of the reasonable daily market demand and to require ratable production by all taking from a common source of supply.

The proration scheme of limiting oil production as practiced in the State of Oklahoma under its so-called curtailment act and the orders of the State corporation commission thereunder were found not to deprive oil-well owners and operators of any rights under the Federal Constitution.

The decision of the court was handed down in a case in which the proration plan was challenged by the Champlin Refining Co., an integrated organization owning wells, refineries and sales outlets. Counsel for the company had urged, among other things, that the plan operates as a price-fixing scheme, deprives a well owner of his property, and burdens interstate commerce. These contentions were rejected by the court in a unanimous opinion written by Mr. Justice Butler.

Relative to the argument that the company "has a vested right to drill wells upon the lands covered by its leases, and to take all the natural flow of oil and gas therefrom so long as it does so without stated physical waste, and devotes the production to commercial uses," the court stated that "if plaintiff should take all the flow of its wells, there would inevitably result great physical waste even if its entire production should be devoted to useful purposes.

The court recognized that "every person has the right to drill wells on his own land and take from the pools below all the gas and oil that he may be able to reduce to possession including that coming from land belonging to others." It ruled, however, that "the right to take and thus acquire ownership is subject to the reasonable exertion of the power of the State to prevent unnecessary loss, destruction, or waste."

The statute in question prohibits the production of petroleum in such a manner or under such conditions as constitute waste. The term waste is defined to include, in addition to its ordinary meaning, economic, underground and surface waste, and waste incident to production in excess of transportation or marketing facilities or reasonable market demands. It empowers the corporation commission to make rules and regulations for the prevention of such wastes, which it has done under its proration plan since April, 1927.

UNCONTROLLED PRODUCTION IS WASTE

Of particular interest in this case is the broad definition given the word waste. It is defined to include production in excess of transportation or marketing facilities or reasonable market demands. And, while the Oklahoma legislation, as also the court decision, was based on what were declared to be conditions peculiar to the oil industry, it is evident that in many other industries the conditions are possibly no less peculiar, although of a different character, and have the same evil results of waste as above defined.

The questions of overproduction, waste, and excessive competition in the natural-resource industries, particularly oil, coal, and lumber, was made the subject of a prolonged study by a committee of the United States Chamber of Commerce, the chairman of the committee being Matthew S. Sloan, president of the New York Edison Co., and member of the executive committee of the National Industrial Conference Board. This committee reported in 1931, recommending that agreements among producers be permitted under Federal supervision. The recommendation was as follows:

The committee recommends that a tribunal of officials of the Federal Government familiar with natural-resource industries should be authorized to permit agreements for curtailment of production in such an industry during the continuance of a condition of overproduction found by the tribunal to be injurious to the public interest.

These excesses of competition are by no means limited to the United States. They are characteristic of all the industrialized countries of the world. An excellent world picture of this situation has been recently presented by Sir Arthur Salter, former director of the economic and finance section of the League of Nations, and a recognized authority on world economics, in his book, Recovery: The Second Effort. I quote from that book:

The world's economic mechanism has lost its self-adjusting quality. And never was it so much needed. New process succeeds new process; the public taste and demand alter incalculably; and every improvement in the transmission of news and in transport increases both the range and the rapidity of the reactions of every change. The mechanism which adjusts production to new demands; which corrects sporadic excesses of supply; which moves capital where it is needed; which stops, or directs, or expands enterprise; which adapts every activity to this shifting environment, needs to be flexible and rapid. And everywhere we see that it is precisely these qualities which it has been losing.

We can perhaps, here and there, restore the frictionless self-adjusting quality of the old freely working competitive system. But in every sphere which we have examined we find that this alone will not suffice. We need to supplement it by planned direction, by a regulative control. In the sphere of money and gold, for example, we may perhaps remove some of the impediments to the traditional working of the gold standard, such as the sudden imposition of new tariffs; but we can never have a tolerable medium of world trade unless Governments and central banks pursue the agreed objective of a stable general price level through deliberate and cooperative action. In the credit system we may gradually reestablish the confidence of the investor; but we can never avoid the disasters entailed by ill-judged loans unless the great issue houses have at least a recognized standard of conduct and some accepted basis of policy. Programs of industrial production obviously need to be based more upon collective estimates, and to be subject, where necessary, in their execution to some collective influence.

The defects of the capitalist system have been increasingly robbing it of its benefits. They are now threatening its existence. A period of depression and crisis is one in which its great merit, the expansion of productive capacity under the stimulus of competitive gain, seems wasted; and its main defect, an increasing in ability to utilize productive capacity fully and to distribute what it produces tolerably, is seen at its worst. And, in the mood of desperation caused by impoverishment and unemployment, the challenge of another system becomes more formidable. No one can expect that even if we get through now without disaster, we can long avoid social disintegration and revolution on the widest scale if we have only a prospect of recurring depressions, perhaps of increasing violence.

We have before us only the alternatives of collective leadership, collective control, or chaos—not, indeed, quite mutually exclusive; for in practice we shall have something of all three. We must do our best to eliminate the third, and make the best mixture we can of the first two. For this is no simple choice between two alternatives: "Hands off industry by the politician" or "Leave it to the Government"; "private enterprise" or "State control"; "capitalism" or "communism." We evade our intricate and complex task if we think it can be solved by slogans instead of reason.

PROPOSALS FOR INDUSTRIAL PLANNING

Mr. Chairman, that the dissatisfaction with the present results of our competitive system is very widespread is evidenced by the many proposals put forward during the past year or so for a system of national industrial planning. Such proposals have come from some of our most conservative business and political leaders—such as Gerard Swope and Owen D. Young of the General Electric Co., Nicholas Murray Butler, president of Columbia University, and leaders of the United States Chamber of Commerce. A brief statement of certain outstanding proposals of this character, as given in an address by Mr. Grover Whalen, general manager John Wanamaker, New York City, before the Taylor Society, December 4, 1931, may be quoted in this connection:

1. Swope plan: Trade associations, membership in which is compulsory after three years for companies with 50 or more employees; rulings mandatory.

2. United States Chamber of Commerce plan: National Economic Council; power not mandatory, but suggestive.

3. American Federation of Labor plan: National Economics Council; power not mandatory, but suggestive; development of more scientific plan of production.

4. "Forum plan" (Jay Franklin): "United States Incorporated"; 5 per cent of corporation and partnership control of stock of all business to be turned over to Government for five years; key industries to be grouped into regional or national monopolies; dividends to citizens later issued in form of consumption goods at cost.

5. Stuart Chase's plan: "Peace Industries Board"; revival of War Industries Board for 10-year plan; seven members, using coercive, mandatory power; confined to 20 or 30 basic, necessary industries.

6. Matthew Woll-James W. Gerard plan for National Civic Federation: "Business congress" of all existing industrial organizations, in continuous session; no limitations or restrictions; full and complete power, even to fix prices or combine; 10-year plan.

7. Prof. Charles A. Beard's plan: "National economic council," authorized by Congress, to coordinate the highly concentrated industries in finance, operation, distribution, on the basis that business is public-service enterprise. Also "Board of strategy and planning"; each industry governed by subsidiary syndicates.

8. Associated General Contractors of America plan: Grant by Congress of greater power to Federal Reserve Board; bond issues to be authorized for revolving fund for specific construction and improvements; bond issues also for increasing public and semi-public construction; Federal reserve to guarantee solvency of banks and force hoarded capital to circulate; public-debt retirement to be deferred.

In the New York Times of May 8, 1932, Mr. John Corbin, in the course of an article dealing with these various proposals, comments on these striking changes in conservative opinion, and points out that the idea of industrial planning is but carrying out the same principles as those embodied in the Interstate Commerce Commission and other Federal commissions.

Is it possible that such men have gone back on what President Hoover calls "our rugged American individualism"; are flirting with socialism, with communism? To many or most of us it has seemed so. The denunciation of what they propose has been as widespread as its advocacy—perhaps more eloquent. And invariably it rests its case upon the incompatibility of national control with the individualistic genius of our people and with our Government as established under the Constitution. That issue is definite and concrete.

But is it the real issue? In the view of the exponents of national planning, it is not. Though the earliest of them used Russia as their text, as a springboard from which to project themselves into the form of debate, they were careful, when they came to concrete proposals, to base them upon familiar American practice. Thus, what Stuart Chase advocated in his path-breaking article in Harper's Magazine last summer was a rehabilitation of the famous War Industries Board; and one and all of his successors, as we shall see, have likewise proposed, as the primum mobile of industrial planning, a general board or commission falling into the category of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Federal Reserve Board.

The fact may or may not endear them to us. Though government by commission has a history in this country of almost half a century, neither the standard historians and economists nor our industrial leaders have arrived at any mature and authoritative opinion as to its value. Yet to anyone familiar with recent decades of industrial history, the briefest of statements should be enough to show that the true background of national planning lies in a pre-war and pre-Bolshevist development of our own American institutions.

REGULATION AN AMERICAN POLICY

Governmental regulation of industry in the United States is thus not to be regarded as a new thing. As Mr. Corbin points out in the article referred to, such regulation arose from the "difficulty of controlling the gigantic new forces set free in the nineteenth century by the industrial revolution," and the recognition that the laissez faire principle in its pure form was not working out for the good of the community.

The movement began in 1887 with the passage of the first interstate commerce act under the Cleveland administration. President Cleveland signed it because he believed there were abuses that could not otherwise be corrected, but it is reported that he expressed his fear of it as being "socialistic."

At first the Interstate Commerce Commission had little authority. Its duty was primarily to observe and recommend. Later, however, its authority was greatly extended, and similar regulatory bodies appeared in other fields of industry—the Federal Reserve Board, the Federal Trade Commission, the Farm Board, and recently, the Federal Power Board, and the Federal Radio Commission.

I have referred thus briefly to these various boards and commissions to indicate that there is nothing new, revolutionary, or socialistic in the idea of Government supervision or regulation such as is suggested in the various proposals for national planning.

All of these plans rest on the thesis that planning involves control, and that the Government, although it may leave the details of planning to industrial associations, must act as final arbiter. Planning and unrestrained competition are incompatible, and no industry or group of industries can be trusted always to respect the public interest unless the public has a certain measure of control. This, the Swope plan, one of the conservative, clearly recognizes. As described by Mr. Corbin:

Mr. Swope proposes "to start from the bottom and build upward." He conceives of our basic industrial units much as the Constitution of 1787 conceived of the 13 States; and he provides for a balanced interplay between "local" self-government in our industrial life and national authority. Not Congress but "organized industry" should "take the lead," coordinating production and consumption "on a broader and more intelligent basis." As this is "impossible under our present laws," the Sherman Act should be suspended to permit it.

Such a plan would "preserve the benefits of individual originality, initiative, and enterprise." But there would be danger of monopoly and of other conspiracies against the interests of the Nation as a consuming whole. The self-governing industrial units must submit all projects openly and freely to some "agency of the Federal Government." Mr. Swope mentions the Federal Trade Commission, but he seems inclined to an "agency" especially created and empowered—a universal national commission, superior to the commissions for the several industries, which shall presumably have some such relation to them as the present National Government has to the several States.

COMPELLING FORCE IS NECESSARY

The recent experience of the cotton textile industry is an excellent example of the failure of big industries to control themselves without outside supervision. The cotton textile industry a year or so ago attempted to obtain an agreement among all the textile mills to restrict night operation in order to prevent destructive overproduction. The idea was an excellent one and had the approval of the administration. But it failed because a few backward-looking mills refused to join in the plan. Mr. Henry P. Kendall, himself a large cotton-mill operator, describes these efforts in the Survey Graphic of March, 1932, and concludes as follows:

Some compelling force must be invoked. It might come through concerted action of the governors of the cotton textile States. It may be that legislation is the only final answer. Certainly, unless the industry itself corrects this fundamental fault of overlong work weeks some outside corrective must be sought.

Dean Donham, in Business Adrift, does not doubt the necessity for legislation. He declares:

Preserve individual initiative? Yes. But should we admit that industrial initiative can not be coordinated with intelligent planning? If so, we shall be fortunate if we retain individual initiative in the face of such shocking waste of community resources, for it may turn out that, from a material point of view, socialism makes possible higher standards of living than capitalism. I should be willing to pay even this price for personal liberty and individual initiative, but do not think it necessary. I believe we can secure competent general business planning without losing liberty and personal initiative. * * * The necessity for some method of making legal agreements which can stop senseless competition, with its threat to the stability of established industrial groups and its shocking economic waste, is becoming more and more apparent. In the course of working out any such reappraisal, legislation is essential.

Here is what Owen D. Young says as printed in the New York Times September 17, 1931:

We can retain in this country unorganized industrial planning and operation; but if we do, its action will necessarily be at times chaotic and we shall, as a result, pay the economic penalty of that disorder, such as we are paying now. * * * Cooperation is required by the great majority of the participants and the coercion of the rest may ultimately be necessary. * * * Every advance in social organization requires the voluntary surrender of a certain amount of individual freedom and the ultimate coercion of the minority. It is not the coercion of the recalcitrant minority but the voluntary submission by the large majority which should impress us.

PRINCIPLES OF CONTROL

Mr. Chairman, from this review of the facts and of present-day opinion regarding the operation of our traditional economic system in this new age, the problem confronting us is made clear. It is to avoid on the one hand the evils of monopoly, and on the other the evils of unrestrained and reckless competition. The problem is difficult but not insoluble. The solution, indeed, is suggested in certain of the proposals made for industrial planning, and while details will have to be worked out, the underlying principles to be accepted and to be followed seem quite clear. These have already been referred to, but may be summarized as follows:

First. Mass production, organized distribution, and other characteristics of present-day industry and finance have sounded the death knell of unrestrained competition. To seek to restore such competition will be a failure and apparent recovery in business from the present depression can be but temporary, because there will immediately be set in motion the same forces of reckless and destructive competition which preceded, and largely caused, the present breakdown.

Second. It is essential that industry obtain a considerable degree of stability, in production, prices, employment, and profits. This can only be done by placing some degree of restriction upon competition, while avoiding the dangers of monopoly. The most logical way of attaining this is to make provision for the organization of the business enterprises in particular industries into trade groups or associations, these associations to have authority to cooperate in general matters affecting the industry as a whole, in order to avoid overproduction and the cutting of prices below the cost of production.

Third. If these associations are intelligently managed, there need be no exploitation of the public; but to avoid such possible exploitation and also to prevent unfair practices by members of the association it will be necessary, of course, to have a measure of governmental supervision and control, but such supervision should be kept at the minimum consistent with the protection of the public interests.

Fourth. The interests of labor must be protected by assuring workers of the right to organize and to bargain collectively, and with the guaranty of fair wages and the right to participate in the increasing productivity of industry.

These principles can be put into force in each of our basic industries without any drastic change in our present form of economic organization.

STABILIZING THE COAL INDUSTRY

The coal regulation bill introduced by Senator DAVIS, of Pennsylvania, and myself meets the need in the bituminous-coal industry. On January 28 I outlined to the House the provisions of this measure. Since then it has been given the most exhaustive consideration by the Senate Committee on Mines and Mining. For weeks both proponents and opponents testified as to its features.

Certain amendments have been agreed upon clarifying the purposes of the legislation. I believe that the principle of cooperation contained in this bill will solve the vital problem of unrestrained and senseless competition, whose damage has been pointed out by the many leaders I have quoted.

This coal bill will provide an opportunity for curbing the destructive competition which for many years has injured the entire bituminous-coal industry. It provides a maximum of stability with a minimum of governmental regulation and permits the development of supervision through the practical experience of those in the industry itself. Since 1919, due largely to the tremendous expansion during the World War, this basic industry has been totally disorganized.

There is no dissent anywhere as to the destructive effects of the unrestricted competition which now prevails. The coal operators are as outspoken in their condemnation of the present system as the representatives of mine workers.

Many executives of coal companies testified for cooperative and combined efforts in the coal industry but favored private combination through regional sales associations which should fix prices and regulate production. The proposed charter of the Appalachian Coals (Inc.), and the projected agreement for regional selling pools were submitted as possible plans for stabilization.

However, the fact that such a plan of cooperation makes no provision for protecting the rights of the public or the mine workers, and the further fact that there is grave doubt as to the legality of this proposed price-fixing plan, in view of the provisions of the antitrust laws which prohibit all price-fixing combinations, should lead to the enactment of this bill.

The measure specifically legalizes the formation of regional sales associations and marketing pools in the various coal regions. These associations and pools establish price and production schedules, which must be approved by the coal commission created by the measure. This commission consists of five members to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the United States Senate. The necessary expenses will be paid from a fund secured by a levy of one-tenth of a cent upon each ton of coal produced by the companies to be regulated.

SELF-GOVERNMENT AND AN UMPIRE

The principle of self-government within the industry is made operative. The commission has no power to establish price or production schedules nor can it restrict marketing areas through zoning methods. It is believed that if destructive competition within the coal regions can be curtailed through reasonable combination, a considerable forward step will be taken.

Industrial corporations engaged in interstate commerce which do not desire to enter such regional sales associations are required to secure a license from the Coal Commission and file a statement of prices and production for the information of the commission.

The labor provisions are only reasonable guaranties that mine workers shall not be compelled to endure the ruinous competition among themselves which is guarded against as far as it concerns the coal producers.

Where selling pools and marketing associations are organized, it is provided that the workers shall not be deprived of the right of collective bargaining. This right may be exercised either through local or general organizations according to the desire of the workers. This provision goes no farther than the declaration of public policy contained in the injunctive relief bill recently enacted by Congress. There the statement of the public policy is as follows:

> Whereas under the prevailing economic conditions, developed with the aid of governmental authority for owners of property to organize in the corporate and other forms of ownership association, the individual unorganized worker is commonly helpless to exercise actual liberty of contract and to protect his freedom of labor, and thereby to obtain acceptable terms and conditions of employment, wherefore it is necessary that he have full freedom of association, self-organization, and designation of representatives of his own choosing, to negotiate the terms and conditions of his employment, and that he shall be free from the interference, restraint, or coercion of employers of labor, or their agents, in the designation of such representatives or in self-organization or in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection.

As to individual corporations not members of pools or associations, the bill simply assures to employees the constitutional rights of free speech and assembly, together with a prohibition of discrimination against workers who are members of labor organizations.

While representatives of certain coal operators opposed these labor provisions, it is believed that they are necessary if there is to be a single step made toward stabilization of the coal industry. Nothing can be accomplished if labor is forced to bear the entire burden of reduced costs of production through the power of the most ruthless producers to reduce wages beyond a fair standard, and thus profit at the expense of more humane operators. If the reasonable right of organization is protected, there is basis for the hope that the labor cost of producing coal will be stabilized to some degree, and this will aid in stabilizing the entire industry.

SHORTER HOURS ARE ESSENTIAL

Through collective bargaining fair wages and fair hours of labor may be secured. Improved methods and mechanization have increased production per man to an enormous degree. The reward of all the effort which made this possible should not go to one group or class. Shorter working hours with the maintenance of fair wages will spread this benefit over all groups in the industry. Let operators and workers meet on equal grounds and this inevitable step toward reduced hours will be taken. They can not fail to see that the fact that production has increased 100 per cent during a period while hours were shortened 15 per cent is responsible for much of the present situation. Together they will act for sound remedy.

Representations were made before the committee that the control of prices and production provided in the measure will enhance the cost of coal to consumers.

The depression which to-day menaces the safety and security of this Nation is tragic proof that low prices do not necessarily promote the public welfare. When coal is sold at a price which means eventual bankruptcy for producers and starvation for mine workers, there is no real benefit to the consumer.

The addition of a few cents a ton to the price of coal at the mine, which would transform the coal industry from a national liability into a national asset, would not mean an increase of one-half of 1 per cent to the cost of manufactured products. With possible increased efficiency in distribution, it should not mean any increase in the cost of the coal in the cellar of the householder.

The stabilization of coal on a basis of fair price and fair wage will do more to bring about economic and industrial restoration than many measures now under consideration by Congress.

Each sane observer admits that business confidence will not return until there is assurance of an upward trend of prices and employment. This assurance can only come through wise and businesslike redistribution of buying power. If we can solve the double problem of prices and wages, we can emerge from this depression which to-day palsies industrial and business America.

WILL THE CONSTITUTION PERMIT?

The constitutionality of the measure was brought in question by attorneys representing various coal companies and organizations. The question of constitutionality is always raised whenever an attempt is made to promote the common welfare by meeting new conditions. Yet the Supreme Court, through a long series of decisions, is proving that the test of a law's constitutionality is whether it is in the public interest.

Judge Brandeis well expressed the true situation when he said:

> I see no need to amend the Constitution. It has not lost its capacity to meet new conditions, unless it be interpreted by rigid minds which have no such capacity. Instead of amending the Constitution, I would amend men's economic and social ideas.

In the Workmen's Compensation Cases (243 U. S. 188, 219) the Supreme Court declared the worker to be "the soldier of industry" and industry as the "joint enterprise of capital and labor." In the Kansas Insurance Case (233 U. S. 389) the court said:

> Government, State and National, has pressed on in the general welfare and our report is full of cases where in instance after instance the exercise of regulation was resisted and yet sustained against attacks asserted to be justified by the Constitution of the United States. The dread of the moment having passed, no one is now heard to say that rights were restrained or their constitutional rights impaired.

I admit that the Supreme Court has held that there can not be direct control over property or definite things which belong to natural persons. In the coal bill we deal only with corporations of which the Supreme Court has said, "while by fiction of law is recognized for some purposes as a person, is not endowed with the unalienable rights of a natural person." (193 U. S. 197–362.)

The fact is that under modern conditions, the individual stockholder in a corporation has no control whatever over his property. The Bethlehem Steel Co. presented $32,000,000 to its executives when only $41,000,000 was paid to the common-stock holders who had no knowledge of the bonuses. Between 1925 and 1928 the common-stock holders did not receive a penny in dividends, yet certain favored executives were paid almost seven millions.

No wonder the Supreme Court said in Two hundred and eighty-second United States Reports, page 19:

> The corporation is a person whose ownership is a nonconductor that makes it impossible to attribute an interest in its property to its members.

One thing is certain, if there is to be control of the production of coal there must be some coercion of minorities. It must be done by the National Government under the commerce clause.

To-day the coal business is dominated by its interstate operations—buying and selling across State lines and transportation across State lines. Mining coal is only a stage in the flow of coal from the mines to the market. Mining serves interstate commerce to fulfill its function.

No State can deal with interstate commerce, and neither can compacts between States, unless Congress should delegate its powers to such compacts. Such action would leave out of consideration the interests of the country as a whole. It follows that the National Congress must act in the vital question of coal control and stabilization. There is power to compel the operator of an airplane to secure a license. Surely there is power to force the operator of a far more dangerous machine—an interstate corporation—to take out a license and comply with proper regulations in the public interest.

I will trust the Supreme Court to decide wisely and justly the vital problem of production control. I agree with Benjamin A. Jacobs, of the New York bar, in his book, Business and the Public Interest, when he says:

> The policy of waiting for the operation of the so-called natural economic laws which has been going on for centuries may be likened to the Spartan custom of exposing a baby on a mountain top to test its vitality. It is a method of many casualties which has bankrupted and destroyed civilizations. The world to-day is too sensitive and complex, its economic processes are too intricate, its nerves are too strained, to stand any more acute depressions without inviting confusion and disintegration. If we await the operation of these so-called immutable and natural economic laws, the patient bids fair to suffer a fatal relapse.
> * * * * * * *

> Changing societies have changing methods for preserving themselves. The constant din about supply and demand from people who should know better makes me feel as if we were still living in an age when it was regarded as heresy to be treated for a disease on the theory that disease was a divine visitation which must not be interfered with or impeded.
> Instead of thinking in terms of a static, inflexible, and fixed order of society wherein past cycles must inevitably repeat themselves, we should see this country as it is, as a growing live thing which can not be kept any longer in the suit that it has worn. The suit is ripping all over. Patching it at one place only creates a rip in another. We must design and create a new suit for this growing youngster; and we must be in readiness to change the suit again and again as growth continues. Patching will not do!

BOTH PARTIES FOR COAL CONTROL

There is no partisanship embodied in this coal bill, as both major political parties have emphatically demanded remedial action.

The 1928 Republican platform with reference to coal legislation declared as follows:

> The party is anxious, hopeful, and willing to assist in any feasible plan for the stabilization of the coal-mining industry which will work with justice to the miners, consumers, and producers.

The 1928 Democratic platform, with reference to coal legislation, declared as follows:

> Bituminous coal is not only the common base of manufacture, but it is a vital agency in our interstate transportation. The demoralization of this industry, its labor conflicts and distress, its waste of a national resource, and disordered public service demand constructive legislation that will allow capital and labor a fair share of prosperity with adequate protection to the consuming public.

This measure gives an opportunity to the coal industry to exercise economic statesmanship in its own field. Its present deplorable situation is due to the lack of constructive policies and plans in the past. There should be sufficient ability and wisdom in this industry, both among operators and workers, to operate successfully the plan proposed in this measure. At least the important issues involved justify this legislative effort to evolve a plan for reducing the manifold evils of cut-throat competition in the bituminous-coal industry.

It may well be made a part of a general relief program for the rehabilitation of the bituminous-coal industry and its restoration as an enterprise profitable to producer, worker, and public will be of nation-wide benefit.

It is true that the control of production necessary to stabilize industry and employment can not be secured by one uniform organization, such as I have outlined, for the coal industry. That form will serve for the great natural-resource industries, but for industries producing standardized, trade-marked products there should be resale price contracts between manufacturer and distributor, without agreement between producers.

Since they manufacture goods which have many rivals for public favor, their industrial control of price and production must always be used at their own peril. If they are given power to protect themselves against the predatory methods of price-cutting retailers, the stabilization of their prices will be in the public interest.

Railroads and power industries demand greater control than others, since they vitally affect all activities in the industrial order.

The essential point is that industries must be kept going and the capital, management, and labor dependent on them must be assured a fair reward. At the same time consumers must be protected against monopoly power. To accomplish that mighty task, there must be clear vision and boldness sufficient to work out the needed adjustments.

Business will have to realize that its problems of unemployment, starvation wages, losses, and bankruptcies are also national problems in which all America is interested. Such questions require teamwork between business and political leadership.

The great question for Members of Congress as well as leaders in industry is, How may be cooperate to meet the problems of this new age of machine production and maintain fair prices, fair wages, and prevent the unemployment which threatens the safety and security of business and the Nation?

UNEMPLOYMENT THE SUPREME PROBLEM

Mr. Chairman, I close as I began. Unemployment to-day threatens the very foundation of our economic system. It is the duty of every American to advocate policies in line with American institutions for remedy of existing conditions.

Sinister interests are making a deliberate effort to demoralize the people and overwhelm Congress so that they may take command and perpetuate their own power regardless of the interests of the public.

Congress, whatever its defects and weaknesses and whatever mistakes it makes, is the greatest bulwark of our democracy. In a time like this only Congress, whose duty is to act in the public interest, and which can act without regard to profit, can break the deadlock.

Let Congress face its responsibility and its opportunity now. We should provide for hungry Americans; inaugurate a public-works program for widespread employment; establish shorter hours wherever governmental power exists and urge similar action upon private industry; uphold high wages and a more just distribution of the national income.

Then, we should act constructively for the coordination of production and consumption and the stabilization of prices along the lines I have outlined.

Through such action we can defeat this depression and prevent its recurrence through a security and a stability which will make the machines of this new age serve the best interests of all of us.

Through such action we can help to cast down the false gods of a cutthroat system and enthrone again the God of our fathers whose purpose for His people is the establishment of brotherhood wherein each individual may have a fair chance for life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

The wilderness of economic conditions lies all around us. We must conquer it with the same vision and courage and faith which enabled our forefathers to master the physical wilderness in their day.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I concur in the statement just made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] that the measures we have been considering are merely palliatives, and that we will have to get at the fundamentals.

I agree that it will be necessary, before we adjourn, to pass a relief bill of staggering magnitude, containing a vast construction program, authorizing loans for public and semipublic projects, thereby stimulating industry and providing employment in addition to direct relief. I for one shall resist any adjournment until that is accomplished. I have made that statement on the floor many times. I know I am voicing the sentiments of a large number of the Members in so doing.

I asked for a minute or two this morning because I want to point out to my colleagues and friends from the farming districts that I shall accept their judgment of the necessity and usefulness of this measure. It increases the power to the Secretary of Agriculture and increases the channels where loans may be made by permitting loans on livestock, poultry, and dairy farming and crop planting and cultivating, including summer fallowing. If they say it will help agriculture, I shall go along and vote for it. The RECORD to-morrow will show that the rule under which this bill is being considered was called up by a Member from the city of New York, my colleague, Mr. O'CONNOR, a member of the Committee on Rules. The RECORD will show to-morrow that not a single city Member will vote against this bill, because the Representatives of the farming districts assure us that it will aid agriculture. It is by that example, not mere lip service, that many of us from the industrial centers and from big cities are seeking to bring about cooperation between the workers of the city and the workers on the farm. And this is not the first instance of that, nor will it be the last. I merely ask my colleagues from the farming districts when something concerning the city comes up to approach it in the same broad-minded, patriotic manner that we do this. [Applause.]

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD].

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, it is interesting to me to read that this bill stresses livestock, poultry, and dairy farming, and if I am not correct in assuming that the measure means what it says—namely, that money shall be loaned to farmers, individually, for crop planting and crop cultivation, I wish to be so informed by the committee. I should like to make some comment this afternoon, inasmuch as I feel so strongly regarding the financial measures which have already been passed this session and the definite results thus far observed.

I fear that before the Congress adjourns we may be obliged to authorize another very large sum to be loaned by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation direct to corporations and even to individuals. Such procedure would very probably be much criticized by the banks of the country; yet these have certainly been saved by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, as have the depositors in those banks. By it closed banks, too, have been assisted by being allowed sufficient time to liquidate their assets more opportunely.

Yet after these banks—and their depositors—have been saved they have in many instances, apparently, felt that they must proceed in a very guarded manner in making loans during these troubled times. To my mind, one of the most serious decisions with which we are faced during these final days of the Congress is that of whether or not we shall instruct the Rediscount Corporation to make loans direct to the people, who claim that they are now unable to secure loans from their usual banking institutions. Under the Garner bill passed by the House, provision was made for direct loans to corporations, while under a Senate bill now being considered provision is made for direct loans to individuals. We know that the people are appealing to their banks for financial assistance but, after their recent experiences, the banks feel that their first duty is to their depositors and are consequently loath to grant credit on many classes of loans which were formerly approved.

Such banks dare not accept real estate as security, since examiners from the office of the comptroller are prone to criticize loans of this nature and demand that the borrowers' assets in addition to real estate disclose assets in value in approved liquidating securities twice the amount of the loan. The people have not got them now. Under these circumstances we should not too harshly criticize our banking institutions. What would we ourselves do if we were in the place of responsibility occupied by their officers. Theoretically they can loan much money, obtainable from the Federal reserve bank, as a result of the legislation which we have enacted this year, making a good deal of new paper available for rediscount; but they do not wish to assume the responsibility as guarantor of such paper, insisting that a good deal of it is not of a kind which should be acceptable to the Federal reserve and against which currency of the United States should properly be issued.

It is true that the banks have a serious problem, but it is that of the Congress also, and before we adjourn we may be forced to instruct the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to deal directly with individuals in order to revitalize business. In the bill under discussion we are doing this through the medium of the Department of Agriculture, and I again suggest that we do not stress "livestock, poultry, and dairy farming," so that the department may interpret it that the benefits are to be extended merely to these enterprises, when the measure plainly says that loans shall also be made direct to the farmer for crop raising.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. GARBER].

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Chairman, members of the committee, I regret that the limited time at my disposal will not permit me to yield for interruptions. If, however, at the conclusion of my remarks any time remains, I shall be glad to do so. The proposed amendment to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act would authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to make loans for crop or livestock production, including poultry, to carry on dairy farming, or for crop planting or crop cultivation, including summer fallowing during the year 1932. Under existing law the Secretary of Agriculture has limited loans for the production of such crops as would mature and be harvested during the year 1932. He is now being severely criticized by the members of this committee because of such construction. The language of the act reads: "For crop production during the year 1932." It will readily be seen that such did not include crop production for the year 1933. The Secretary is to be commended for his correct construction of the act and his administration in carrying out the purposes of Congress as clearly and expressly stated. I resent such criticism of the Secretary as being wholly unjustified. He has construed and administered the law as liberally as the language of Congress will permit.

The proposed amendment is a new and extended grant of power to the Secretary. It includes loans for livestock, poultry, dairy farming, and crop planting, including summer fallowing during the year 1932. Through this grant of power the Government, through the Secretary of Agriculture, will be loaning money direct to the farmers for the purposes stated in the amendment. Only the existing grave emergency conditions should ever warrant such extension, which when once made, will be cited as a precedent for years to come; but let it be recorded that conditions more serious than those which confronted us during the World War are the sole cause and justification for such extension, which is temporary and for a period of one year only. I am supporting this amendment, but I do so as a last and only resort. Without this assistance the farmers in many districts would be unable to raise a crop next year.

Upon the approval of the pending amendment, the Secretary will be authorized to make loans for the purposes above stated in a total amount of $200,000,000, but even such amount for such purposes is only a palliative, a temporary makeshift, to bridge over a short period, to promote crop production at a loss to the farmers. From the economic standpoint of profit, they would be better off without it. Why not state the truth and face the facts?

PROSPERITY MUST EMANATE FROM THE FURROW

For years we have been insisting that the prosperity of the industrial States had never reached the farmers, and that the industrial interests would have to cooperate in bringing agriculture to an equality with industry, or sooner or later industry would be dragged down to the low level of agriculture. On May 17, 1924, in a speech upon agricultural conditions and the imperative need for immediate relief, among other things, we said:

The temporary prosperity now existing has been exacted from the credit and credit momentum of the farmers given to them by increased credit facilities of recent legislation, but such increased credit facilities have almost been exhausted. While they have been furnishing 40 per cent of the home market, which in turn consumes 90 per cent of all our products, they can not do it any longer. Their purchasing power has been exhausted. The indebtedness contracted by them during the high prices, in response to the appeal of the Government for increased production, remains unpaid. They are no longer able to meet the daily exactions of the high cost of living and high industrial prices, the annual demands of high taxes, and interest charges. They have ceased buying farm implements or making farm improvements or necessary repairs. Even now they are drawing on their last reserve—their remaining equity in their land.

Another year of ruinous prices and the farm will be sacrificed. His farm—"the best home of the family"—will be sold at sheriff's sale and the ancient independence of our once proud agriculture will be gone. What will be the result when 40 per cent of the purchasing power of our home market is gone? Can there be any doubt as to what the result will be? Curtail industrial production 40 per cent and what will you have? You will have closed mines, closed factories, silent mills. You will have millions out of employment, hungry women and children, bread lines, and widespread dissatisfaction and discontent.

What we have been insisting during these years in the Congress and the press has now materialized. During these years, as the prices for farm products have gradually declined, the purchasing power of the farmers has declined, until finally such purchasing power has decreased with the price of farm products to 50 per cent below the normal economic level of 1926; and now, with a purchasing power not even sufficient to meet their current obligations for taxes, interest, mortgages, and the few necessaries of life, the industrial States have lost their greatest market for their products and their industries have been brought down to a level with the industries of agriculture.

We see smokeless furnaces, idle factories, vast armies of unemployed, long bread lines composed of gaunt and haggard men out of employment through no fault of their own—the heads of destitute families. The prophecy made eight years ago has been literally fulfilled.

Mines are closed, factories closed, mills silent, millions are out of employment, hungry women and children in bread lines for food, with widespread dissatisfaction and discontent.

From this great tragedy that stands out in bold relief in the present world-wide depression, we hope the lesson will be learned once and for all that the prosperity of this country must emanate in the first instance from the soil, from the furrow that the farmer plows in the field. You deny a reasonable price for the product that he produces, and sooner or later you will deny prosperity to the country.

During these years of declining agriculture, the farmers were besought to expand and increase their production to win the war, for which they incurred obligations for high-priced implements and labor and lands, and have ever since been engaged in endeavoring to pay off such obligations and maintain their operations. The following table shows the existing total mortgage indebtedness of the farmers:

Farm mortgage debt, January 1

(From Farm Mortgage Credit, by David L. Wickens, agricultural economist, division of agricultural finance, Bureau of Agricultural Economics, United States Department of Agriculture, February, 1932)

United States:
1910	$3,320,470,000
1920	7,857,700,000
1925	9,360,620,000
1928	9,468,526,000

While farm debts were mounting rapidly upward, farm-land values and farm prices declined enormously. Farm-land values dropped more than $22,000,000,000 in the period 1920–1931, falling from $66,316,002,602 in 1920 (census of 1920) to $44,145,210,966 in 1931, or a decline of $22,170,791,636. The index of farm-land values in 1931 was 106 per cent of the pre-war level, or only slightly above pre-war values. Farm prices declined from an index level of 205 in 1920 to 60 in February, 1932.

How can the farmers ever pay off their mortgage indebtedness with their purchasing power reduced 49.1 per cent? How can they ever be expected to meet their interest payments, taxes, current obligations, and coming-due mortgages? I ask the members of this committee, how is it possible for the farmers to meet their financial obligations with a purchasing power so low that it requires three times the quantity of farm products to pay the obligations than was required at the time they were incurred? That you may see the extent farm taxes have increased, I incorporate the following table:

Index numbers of farm taxation

(1910–1914=100)

[Bureau of Agricultural Economics, U. S. Department of Agriculture]

Year:	Taxes
1914	100
1915	102
1916	104
1917	106
1918	118
1919	130
1920	155
1921	217
1922	232
1923	246
1924	249
1925	250
1926	253
1927	258
1928	263
1929	267
1930	266

This table shows that, assuming the taxes paid by the farmer in 1914 was 100, they had increased to 155 in 1920, and in 1930 they had reached 266.

As a result of war-time price inflation and war-time demand, farm income reached approximately $16,000,000,000 in 1919. From that high level it fell to about $9,000,000,000 in 1921, recovering to approximately $12,000,000,000 in 1925.

During the last eight years, including 1931, the Department of Agriculture estimates the gross income of the 6,000,000 or more American farms as follows:

	Crops	Livestock	Total
1924	$5,167,000,000	$6,170,000,000	$11,337,000,000
1925	5,820,000,000	6,147,000,000	11,698,000,000
1926	6,012,000,000	5,648,000,000	11,480,000,000
1927	5,799,000,000	5,817,000,000	11,616,000,000
1928	6,066,000,000	5,675,000,000	11,741,000,000
1929	6,249,000,000	5,603,000,000	11,851,000,000
1930	5,208,000,000	4,226,000,000	9,434,000,000
1931	2,920,000,000	4,000,000,000	6,920,000,000

It will be noted from this table that farm income held to a fairly even level from 1924 to 1929; that the subsequent loss was about evenly divided between 1930 and 1931, and that income from grain and other crops, falling by 53.4 per cent since 1929, shows a much greater decline than income from livestock, which fell by only 28.7 per cent.

Between 1929 and 1931 farm income dropped from $12,000,000,000 to $6,900,000,000, or a drop of approximately $5,000,000,000 within that period.

How could the farmer pay his bills in 1931 with his total income from both crops and livestock reduced 41.6 per cent below that for 1929 and 40.2 per cent below the average for the five preceding years? The answer is obvious. He could not do it. Losing so heavily during the year 1932 left him without sufficient means to put in the fall crops for 1933, and it is because of these conditions I am supporting this amendment to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to make loans to the farmers for crop production purposes, to include summer fallowing and fall planting of crops maturing during 1933. His tremendous losses from shrinkage of land values and producing below the cost of production have left him with current financial obligations that constitute a continuous menace and threat of dispossession. During the period from 1926 to 1931, inclusive, 813,604 farm foreclosures were effected, and the owners dispossessed of their lands. I incorporate the following table:

Estimated number of farms transferred by reason of delinquent taxes or mortgage foreclosure, bankruptcies, or other forced sales, by years, 1926–1930

[Statement by Fred Brenckman, Washington representative of the National Grange, before Interstate Commerce Commission, Ex parte 103, Aug. 10, 1931]

Total		24.3	83.7	153,598	529,252	682,850

The figures in the above table are made upon estimates furnished by the Department of Agriculture.

The data for the year 1931 is not yet available, but if the increase is the same for that year as it was for 1930, and we have every reason to believe that it will be even greater, the total number of foreclosures will exceed 813,654, or more than three-fourths of a million and more than one-eighth of all the farms in the United States. How will the farmers ever be able to halt the avalanche of foreclosure proceedings that are now being instituted against them in every section of the country? Through the centrifugal force of the vicious circles of this world-wide depression the farmers have been engulfed in the whirlpool of destruction. Through no fault of their own they are engulfed in the maelstrom of economic forces destroying their possessions. They are now making their last desperate effort to survive and escape, but inability to meet their coming-due obligations is a constant menace of foreclosure proceedings and dispossession. One-eighth of their number have already been forced to abandon their farms. The number is rapidly increasing. I call upon every member of this committee to take notice and warning that unless something can be done to save them in their dire extremity and tragic plight the food industries of agriculture will collapse, the entire economic structure will collapse, banks will close, factories and manufacturing establishments yet running will close, and the millions of unemployed, out of money, with no means to supply food for their destitute families, will feel justified in helping themselves to the necessaries of life to prevent starvation. Then law and order will disappear and the guaranties of the Constitution will not protect. God forbid that such a day shall ever come! It would mark the end of progress. From such a precipice all naturally shrink. We should turn our faces courageously to the grim work of restoration before us.

This palliative of loans for crop production embodied in this amendment will only result in additional losses unless supplemented by major legislation. We have now reached the closing days of this session. Approximately only one week remains before us. Just why the Democratic majority in control of the House and of the Agricultural Committee has continuously delayed the reporting and consideration of a major bill for agriculture in its last desperate struggle for very existence does not appear. As yet there is no such bill on the calendar of this House. Democratic leaders have gone up and down the land, and from every rostrum and platform, declaring that only they could be entrusted to rescue the farmers from their financial plight; that if they were entrusted with power, such would receive their immediate consideration; and here it is, the closing week of the session, without the report of a single major measure for agriculture that in any way tends to afford basic and fundamental relief. We have been in session since the 7th day of December, for a period of more than 195 days, without any effective action being taken. Members will recall the assurances to the country and promises made by our Democratic friends when they assumed control of this House in the election of a Speaker, and in the control of all of its committees, including the House Agricultural Committee, from which alone can emanate legislation for agricultural relief. In the flush of their triumph, the distinguished gentleman from Alabama as their spokesman, after a week or 10 days of inactivity, apologized to the country, saying that his party leaders were studying the needs of the country, that the policy committee, a new political agency to save the country, would adopt and bring forth a constructive program embodying the necessary acts of legislation to meet existing emergency conditions; that when given sufficient time, substantial, beneficial, and lasting results would be accomplished, and yet 195 days have elapsed without ever a word from Democratic leaders for agriculture, and without a single major act to even stay the foreclosure proceedings now pending against the farmers, which will result in their dispossession!

Why have they thus been neglected? I do not know. I can not understand it. There may be some plausible explanation; there possibly may be some color of excuse for such delay. If there is, I am unable to recall it. I can not visualize sufficient justification to so neglect and ignore the financial straits of the farmers of the country, which even involves the homes of 30,000,000 people.

Of course this has been a strenuous session, and the House is to be commended for its consideration and approval of the constructive legislative program recommended by the President. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation act, which we now propose to amend, with increased capitalization of Federal land banks and enlargement of discount facilities of the Federal reserve system, the home building and loan act, were all major measures to loosen up and circulate the credit currency of the country. Our Democratic friends are entitled to credit for the enactment of such a constructive program, a program that was and has been approved by the best constructive thought of the country. Democratic and Republican leaders throughout the Nation have approved such upon its sheer merit as being so much superior to any other recommended as to be unquestioned. Under the conditions of an ordinary depression such legislation would in all probability have been sufficient for recovery, for increased prices, for the restoration of prosperity; but thus far, such results have not materialized, and it clearly appears that agriculture must be included, that we must return to the farm to find the prosperity which we have lost.

Such being apparent to all, the delay of the Democratic policy committee and the Democratic House Agricultural Committee in coming to the rescue of the farmers is indeed to be regretted. This Congress should not adjourn until such major measures are reported, considered, and passed. What has become of the Democratic policy committee which was to direct the legislation of the House for the relief of such conditions as I have depicted? Why the silence of its spokesman within the well of this House? He has used hours of time and pages in the RECORD in recalling the traditions of Jefferson and Jackson and the historical achievements of his party, but not one single plea has he made for legislation to increase the prices of farm products, to restore their purchasing power, and thus enable them to meet their taxes, interest, and mortgage indebtedness! If the Democratic policy committee that was heralded to the country as a great invention, assuring cooperation and effective action for the downtrodden, for the unemployed, for the farmers, ever intended to serve the country, why has it not done so? It has a clear majority in the House to legislate its recommendations, to make a record for the party in the rendition of real service to the country. Why has it failed in this respect? Why has it discontinued to make its recommendations? Why has its spokesman remained silent? With bated breath the country listens; with anxious heart it awaits such action.

What has become of the ferocity of the Democratic majority, of its thirst for the blood of the enemies of labor and and the farmer? What has become of its ringing challenge to the country that it alone is sincere of purpose, with courage sufficient to legislate? Surely it will not be satisfied with loans for crop production which it must know will simply result in additional loss to the farmers unless supplemented by basic legislation. And if such is not forthcoming, will not the farmers be compelled to discontinue production? I ask the Democratic members of this committee if they can expect the farmers to continue their losing fight in producing below the cost of production when their resources, credit, and equities are almost exhausted. Unless they can secure at least the cost of the production of their products, inevitably they will be compelled to discontinue their production. And if you are unwilling to enact the necessary legislation which you have always claimed was necessary, the sooner the farmer quits producing, the less his losses will be. With the exception of such production as will be necessary for the immediate use of himself and family, it would be better for him to quit now than to continue to pile up his losses and increase his financial obligations.

Should not the Democratic policy committee come out openly, frankly, and courageously to the farmers and declare that the Congress will not adjourn until such relief legislation is enacted? Such a word of encouragement would be gratefully received. It would be appreciated. It would evidence the fulfillment at least to some degree of assurances and promises and pledges so frequently made.

I do not know what the dependent millions will do when the farmers discontinue production. Neither do I know what the result will be when they do. Such condition might be very well utilized to put in force the Democratic policy of permitting foreign nations to pay their debts to us in goods. Duties could be reduced to a competitive basis to include the importation of farm products and with a revenue basis, sufficient supplies might be available if the consumers were furnished with wages and salaries with which to buy. If such is the explanation of the refusal of the Democratic majority to report relief legislation for the farmers, they should be sufficiently frank to inform the country. But I am wholly at a loss to understand how the purchase of foreign farm products will help the farmers in this country, increase the purchasing power of their products, or enable them to meet their indebtedness!

The farmers should be rescued from the entanglements of their financial obligations. They should be placed in a position where they will be able to pay with the same quantity of purchasing power which they borrowed and this would insure the payment of obligations which otherwise can never be paid. The dollar of the Shylocks must be brought down to a level with the commodities of the people. It should be stabilized on the all-commodities basis. The fetish of the gold standard that would prohibit any increase in the circulating medium of the country to reestablish former prices should be pulled up, root and branch, and destroyed.

Gold has its place in the monetary system of the world, but it should be made to keep its place. Whenever it becomes insufficient in quantity in any country to afford a basis of circulation, that lack should be supplied with silver. With its traditional background for use as money equal to that of gold, silver should be restored to the place it occupied in 1925, to stabilize international exchange and facilitate foreign trade, especially with the Orient and with countries now off the gold standard.

Unless the purchasing power of the market of the farmers of the country is restored, there can be no return to prosperity. Capital will not invest in wages to the unemployed to manufacture products for which there is no market. Forty per cent of our manufactured products are consumed upon the farm. How can you set the unemployed to work in mines, mills, and factories without a market for their products? A market for such products, then, is necessary; and until you restore the purchasing power of the 30,000,000 people living on the farms of this country so that they can buy the products of labor and capital there will be no market, and you can not expect conditions to improve.

In his address of February 12, 1924, before the National Republican Club in New York City President Coolidge well said:

> The farm has a social value which can not be overestimated. It is the natural home of liberty and the support of courage and character. In all the Nation it is the chief abiding place of the spirit of independence. I do not need to dwell upon the moral requirement for the equitable distribution of prosperity and the relief of distress by the application of every possible and sound remedy. This problem is not merely the problem of the agricultural sections of our country. It is the problem likewise of industry, of transportation, of commerce, and of banking. I bring it to you because I know that in part it is your problem.

In comment upon the above May 17, 1924, I said:

> What is the problem to which the President referred? It is the problem of the rehabilitation of agriculture, its restoration to that plane of equality and prosperity enjoyed by the industries of commerce and labor. It is the most important problem before this Nation to-day. With the exception of providing the essential revenues to keep the Government itself in operation, it is of far higher importance and outweighs the necessity of all other proposed legislation. Of more importance than transportation, of greater necessity than manufacturing, of higher consequence than mining is agriculture, with the family on the farm. Tax reduction is important. Restricted immigration is necessary. The child labor amendment is essential. Likewise the tax-exempt security amendment. But they are as nothing compared to the importance and necessity of relieving our basic industry from its present deplorable condition and restoring prosperity to the farm.
> Agriculture is not only the basic industry but the largest industry as well. It is a $75,000,000,000 concern, in which is directly interested not less than 30,000,000 people living and working on the farms. They constitute 40 per cent of the home market, which in turn consumes 90 per cent of our home products. At one time agriculture furnished 50 per cent of the Nation's bank deposits. With the exception of the railroads, it is the largest consumer of steel and iron products. It consumes 50 per cent of the timber products. It is the largest purchaser of leather and textile goods and motor vehicles. It is the greatest single asset of the Nation, and when prosperous furnishes steady employment to more people than any other industry. Whatever contributes to its prosperity and well-being unquestionably benefits all other lines of industry. When the farmers are prosperous the merchant, the banker, the laborer, the mechanic, the professional man, and all lines of legitimate business are prosperous. Legislation, therefore, in the interest of agriculture is not class legislation, but basic and general. It is in the interest of all.

In our search for prosperity, we must return to the farm. Here is the source from which it originated. Here alone can be furnished the continuing vital forces of trade and commerce, as well as the new blood essential to progress.

The purchasing power of the products of the farm must be restored. It is more important that a reasonable return on the investment be assured to agriculture than to industry, than to railroads, than to banks, insurance companies, and any and all financial agencies for profit. For if there is no reasonable return from the furrow in the field, there can be no reasonable return to trade and commerce.

The farmers are not to blame for this depression; labor is not to blame for this depression. Among the many contributing causes is conceded to be the gambling on the stock exchanges and the high-powered loans made by the international bankers. They cleaned this country of its cash in loans to foreign countries and then destroyed its credit by unloading worthless securities in the banks of our country. They gathered up $16,000,000,000 of the savings of the people and loaned it in foreign countries, deducting millions in commissions to themselves. Then they came back with their worthless foreign securities and unloaded them on the banks throughout this country for more commissions. How did they sell these securities? They just simply allotted so many to each dependent bank, which was equivalent to the command "subscribe." Then the banks, to save themselves, were compelled to draw in their loans and curtail their credit; and curtailment and restriction of credit increased and spread throughout the country until it reached the deadly stage of paralysis; and paralysis of credit and confidence is what is the trouble with the country to-day. The $16,000,000,000 in cash which they shipped out of the country, under normal conditions would have been used as a base for a credit of $80,000,000,000 with which to transact the normal business of the country.

The Wall Street banks which, by rigging the market and high-powered salesmen, unloaded on the smaller banks of the country the worthless securities with millions in commissions to themselves, should either be compelled to dig up or close up. Such a financial crime should not be permitted to go without adequate punishment. It has accentuated and intensified the depression. Capital has fled the market place. It is in hoarding and hiding for safety and security. It will not come forth until it is assured of a profit upon its investment and a profit on investment on wages is dependent upon a market, which, in turn, is dependent upon a purchasing power by the 30,000,000 people living on the farms of the country.

Let us hope that even in these closing days, the Democratic majority will give us the opportunity to pass sound, constructive legislation assuring the restoration of normal prices for farm products and a purchasing power necessary to supply the needs of the farmers. Our duty is to the average farmer of 160 acres of land. We must legislate to release him from the financial entanglements in which he has become enmeshed. He is the backbone of the industry. It is his home which is the abiding place of independence and liberty, that contributes new blood essential to the maintenance of our representative form of government. [Applause.]

"Let the farmer forevermore be honored in his calling, for they who labor in the earth are the chosen people of God." (Jefferson.)

"Trade increases the wealth and glory of a country, but its real strength and stamina are to be looked for among the cultivators of the land." (Lord Chatham.)

"The farmers are founders of civilization and prosperity." (Daniel Webster.)

"There seem to be but three ways for a nation to acquire wealth. The first is by war, as the Romans did, in plundering their conquered neighbors—this is robbery; the second, by commerce, which is generally cheating; the third, by agriculture, the only honest way wherein man receives a real increase of the seed thrown into the ground, in a kind of continual miracle wrought by the hand of God in his favor, as the reward for his innocent life and the virtuous industry." (Franklin.)

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MOUSER].

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes out of order.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Reserving the right to object, will this raise any controversial question?

Mr. MOUSER. I do not think so.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, upon what subject does the gentleman desire to speak?

Mr. MOUSER. I want to address my remarks for two minutes to the bill that was passed yesterday.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman is not intending to touch on any Chicago business?

Mr. MOUSER. I might criticize my own party.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman is going to do that, he will do something that is very deserved.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Chairman, I am in whole-hearted sympathy with this bill. I believe it will bring direct relief to the farmers. However, I wanted to use the few moments I have to address myself to the bill that was passed yesterday. There is only one way we can take care of the silver situation, and that is by an adequate protective tariff. I severely criticized the tariff bill offered by the majority party of this House, on the ground that I did not feel that foreign nations would consider the rights of American business men who employ labor, in a conference. The best we could get out of it would be the worst of it.

At Chicago the party of which I am a member adopted a plank upon foreign relations which apparently was in keeping with the bill that was passed yesterday; but under the terms of that bill the very fundamental economic rights of the people of this country can be discussed by foreign nations, whose interests are contrary to those of our people. I think that measure was a mistake. I think we ought to legislate for America, and we ought to forget the 7 or 8 per cent of the people who export goods over there and think about the 92 per cent who manufacture here and employ labor and sell their goods in this country. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR].

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, this bill provides that loans may be made for crop planting or crop cultivation. Why was not harvesting included? It is just as much a part of producing a crop as planting or cultivating, and some farmers may be able to take care of the planting and cultivating and then need funds for the harvesting. Will the gentleman from Alabama please explain that?

Mr. STEAGALL. That is where our trouble arose. The Department of Agriculture construed the language of the law to apply only to crops grown and harvested and marketed during 1932. We are trying to liberalize it so that loans may be made on crops cultivated during the year, although not completed.

Mr. BARBOUR. But does "cultivated" include "harvested"?

Mr. DAVIS. The act itself says "crop production."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GILBERT].

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes also to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Chairman, this is a good bill as far as it goes, but it does not go very far. I see no objection to it. At the same time, it illustrates how feeble are our efforts when it comes to aiding the greatest and most distressed business we have. It speaks of aiding poultry raising; in fact, it is a chicken feed bill.

I speak not only as friend of the farmer, as the Representative of an agricultural district, but I speak as a farmer himself; as one who lives upon and owns and operates farm lands; as one who finds himself with mortgage indebtedness on those farm lands; and I say to this House that the gentleman from Oklahoma was correct when he said, "We are not putting first things first," but he was woefully wrong when he laid blame upon the Democratic Party. We have spent the session passing legislation sponsored by a Republican President, which has not solved anything, and which, as usual, put corporations, banks, and industry first. The farmer's plight is due to a Republican tariff system. I do not care to discuss that system generally, but restricted to agriculture it has been withering and destructive. That is now obvious. The farmer who is not in debt is not in trouble. We have encouraged too much indebtedness already. It is the farmer who is overwhelmed with mortgage indebtedness, paying a high rate of interest, provided for him by Congress, being required to pay 8 per cent when he is behind in one of his installments to the Federal land bank, who is in trouble. I am no prophet, nor am I the son of a prophet, but I say to you that at the next session of Congress you will do something for the farmer which is of real value or we will fall into a cataclysm. The tariff system of which I spoke as destructive of agriculture has in the past been of help to industry. But in shortsightedness that advantage to one and disadvantageous to the other—agriculture has been continued until all face a debacle.

In selfishness and greed the superstructure has been built higher and higher and the foundation weakened and weakened until the whole building is tottering to collapse.

Favoritism and greed are facing the destruction wrought by their own folly.

I do not suppose the gentleman from Oklahoma can blame this on the Democrats.

This general readjustment must and will take place, but in the meantime what is to be done with farmers who are being sold out, the ones now in debt? They need our help; not the ones so much as will be helped by this bill.

They must be refinanced at not more than 3 per cent and the Government must stand back of the plan.

This I trust will be our first task when we meet in December.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] is right, and you other city fellows are right, in beginning to realize that you can not any longer prosper on a ruined agriculture. The other day when I asked one of these gentlemen from the metropolis to attend a farm meeting he said, "I would look funny there." Well, he has as much interest in that as the branch of a tree has in the roots of the tree.

We have in this Congress passed legislation for industrial corporations through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. We have passed legislation for the city home owner in the home loan bank bill, and I am predicting that the first thing the next Congress takes up is some measure for the farmers. To help save their farms and not to help feed their chickens. [Applause.]

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LANKFORD] such time as he desires.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, there is no better man in the House than the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GILBERT] who has just taken his seat, and I am sure that the farmer has no more loyal friend here than he. I heartily approve everything he has just said, with one exception. In concluding his remarks he said that he predicted "that the first thing in the next Congress is some measure for the farmers; to help save their farms and not to help feed their chickens." Of course, this is only a prediction, but my good friend is evidently not a good prophet. I have served here longer than my noble friend, and I regret to say that I have found every session alike in one respect. Real genuine farm relief never comes first; in fact, it has never come at all—either first or last.

When I first came to Congress, I was informed that some matters for the big interests, along with the appropriation bills, must first have the right of way, and that then some real farm-relief legislation would be enacted. Well, the bills for the monopolies and the appropriation bills passed; and then when all seemed just ready for some real farm legislation, the information became current that Congress had about completed its program and that adjournment was near.

All the farmer got was promises, pretty platform pledges, three cheers, and additional burdens. This has been the identical program every session since I came here, and I understand it always has been the program. I am disheartened, sore, and mad, and regret to say I fear it is to be the program at the next session and during the future Congresses.

It certainly has been the program at this session when it seems if anything is ever to be done for the farmer, now is the time. At the beginning we were told that first we must pass the foreign-debt moratorium for the international bankers and the peoples of Europe, then the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act, for the very rich, and then another bill for the bondholders and big bankers who are interested in the Federal loan system.

Several of us bitterly opposed these measures, but of no avail. Wall Street had asked for them; President Hoover had given his approval and the Democratic leadership was shouting, "Me too." Most of the new Members on the Democratic side said they opposed these surrenders to the big interest, but were voting for them as we would do something for the farmer next. I told them they had better oppose all these vicious proposals as I feared—judging from the past—the farmer never would be reached except to saddle additional burdens on him. That is just what has happened. In fact the big interests got all they want with exception of the failure of Congress to saddle the general sales tax on the ultimate consumers. So, realizing they can not get that, they are now shouting for Congress to adjourn and go home. They fear that if Congress remains in session much longer something may be done for the veterans of the World War, the farmer, the laborer, and the private individual citizen. I admit that if Congress is to continue with the same program in the future as in the past, it would be better to adjourn at once. In fact, it would have been better if it had not met at all.

The fact remains, it is a cowardly act for this Congress to adjourn and the Members rush back home, climb on the stump, and begin to make promises galore—promises as deceptive as the ingenuity of man ever worded and which are made only to deceive and never to be kept.

I repeat it is cowardly and even criminal for Democrats and Republicans—and this is to be a bipartisan speech—to pass all this legislation for those who are hoarding the wealth of the country; do nothing for those who need help and are entitled to relief, and then adjourn and rush home to offer promises to an outraged, suffering, bleeding, dying people.

The Republican and Democratic leaders were most harmonious as long as legislation was being put over for the big financial interests of the Nation. No real controversy arose between these leaders in emphatically, discourteously, and even profanely telling those of us that sought their favor in behalf of the farmers that we were silly if we thought Congress was going to even try to do anything worth while for the farmers at this session.

The only breach of harmony between the Democratic and Republican leaders arose when they began to vie with each other in the construction of the tangled web of politics, to endeavor to enmesh the voters into accepting deception instead of legislation and empty, meaningless promises instead of well-rounded-out genuine service.

Now, Democrats and Republicans would have the country believe that if they can only be elected just once more mighty wonders will be performed and the common people will come into their own.

Why adjourn? Why not now do something worth while for the farmer, the laborer, the unemployed, and the ex-service man? Why act the coward now and expect our people to believe we will be true next Congress? Why not now pass my contract plan of controlling the production, marketing, and selling price of basic farm products, or—if it is found not to be good—turn it down and pass something better? If my plan is not the best and if anyone will suggest a better, I will gladly help with the better plan. Why not now pass my producer-to-consumer perishable-vegetable plan, with its definite certain aid to the farmer, the laborer, the unemployed, and the transportation lines? Why not now solve the transportation question? Why not now? Oh, why not to-night, or to-day, act instead of promise?

Ah, Mr. Chairman, on every side everywhere we will now hear nothing but campaign promises, campaign platforms, and campaign platitudes. There will be promises galore. Promises, promises, promises—promises with undisclosed meaning and promises that mean nothing. I am tired of promises and the people are disgusted with promises. They want men in Congress with definite, well-defined ideas and who stand for certain principles and whose every vote, every speech, and every official act shows them to be loyal to their principles and without shadow of turning.

The people also want and demand candidates for Congress on the outside who seek election against men who are in Congress to stand for definite certain principles and not seek to get in on empty meaningless promises which are made only to get votes and never to be kept.

A man neither in Congress nor out has any right to run in these strenuous, awful times unless he advocates certain well-defined plans for the relief of present suffering, the restoring of prosperity and the perpetuation of the future happiness and security of all our people.

A promise of farm relief is only the ashes of bitterness and despair; the farmer wants a farm-relief program, definite and understandable and which is workable and will do the work. Hundreds of men running for Congress every two years pledge themselves to farm relief, and when elected they do absolutely nothing, stand for nothing, really know nothing about farm relief, and care nothing. This is true of practically all other political promises.

When I criticize the promise maker, I am not at all criticizing any man or set of men who stands for certain, definite, well-defined principles and is not afraid to let the world know where he stands. This man who stands for principles in which he has great faith, is honest, feels he has a mission, and will do his best if elected.

The man I criticize and who should not be elected is he who runs without knowing what he advocates or favors. This kind of a candidate announces without any platform and sometimes never does issue a platform. Then, again, he states at the time of his announcement that he will issue his platform in 10 days or 2 weeks, only to find at the end of the 10 days he does not yet know what he is running on.

This kind of office seeker endeavors to get some one or more persons to tell him what will be catch promises to put in his platform so as to get votes. He usually never takes a definite stand on any well-defined principles. He deals in glittering, meaningless generalities. He says he favors economy, farm relief, lower taxes, sunshine, moonshine, starlight, anything, everything, anywhere, everywhere, just so he can get a few votes. Generally he claims he is pushed into the race by hundreds of enraged and rightfully indignant voters, that he did not at all want to run, and that he felt it was his duty not to run, but just could not resist the tremendous pressure of those he believed to be his friends.

It may be said just here that Congress is a dangerous place for a man to come who can be so easily driven from the path of what he believes to be his duty by the pressure of those who claim to be his friends. Then again I oft-times wonder why a man who is forced into a race by hundreds of people almost always overlooks asking them why they want him to run and thus get a platform. Hundreds of people would not force a man into a race for Congress without what they believed to be good reasons. Certainly, they would not get a good man into a race without telling him what they will expect, and even demand, of him if elected.

Surely a good man would not have two platforms, one an undisclosed platform made up by those who force him into a race, which he expects to keep, and an announced platform which he does not expect to abide by and which is made only to get votes.

Then, again, it so often happens that this kind of good man finally decides to issue no platform at all or decides to wait until the national convention of his party announces a platform and then he can adopt the national platform or perchance get some suggestions as to how to make a platform of his own.

I am glad that I stand for certain definite clear-cut principles and will not abandon them even if the Democratic Party writes or does not write them into the national platform of my party. I am glad I am doing my best to help my party write a good platform for all the people rather than be seeking help myself to write simply a meaningless platform for self, designed only to be used in an attempt to corral votes. I would much rather be urging the Democratic Party to write into the Democratic platform what I believe to be right than to be waiting for some one else to write a platform that might furnish me a way to run for Congress without taking a real stand on the vital issues in this awful time. I do not have to wait until the Democratic convention adopts a platform to determine with all my being that I am opposed to the foreign-debt moratorium; that I am opposed to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act; that I am opposed to a general sales tax as a Federal policy; that I am opposed to bureaucratic government; that I am opposed to the high-tariff principle; that I am opposed to chain banking; that I am opposed to great centralization of financial and political power; that I am opposed to recent tax bill; that I am opposed to letter-postage increase; that I am opposed to new Federal tax on candies and similar articles; that I am opposed to the electric-current tax; that I am opposed to letting the valuable property at Muscle Shoals rot to the ground rather than evolve and put into effect a program giving cheaper fertilizer to the farmers and helping all other lines of financial endeavor throughout our country; and that I am opposed to many other legislative proposals too numerous to mention.

It requires no report of the resolutions committee of the Democrats in Chicago to cause me to know I favor the payment of the balance of the adjusted compensation of the World War veterans; favor a safe and sane expansion of the currency, and the putting of much more money in circulation; I favor the issuance and sale of Government bonds to finance present emergency financial needs of the Government and country rather than additional Federal tax burdens just now; I favor refinancing of long-term farm loans and farm lands taken over by foreclosures and the return of lands already taken from farmers; I favor for the head of each family, for home purposes an exemption from all taxes of a reasonable amount of real and personal property; I favor the sale of vegetables, eggs, watermelons, and other perishable food products more directly from the producer to the consumer, so that the ultimate consumer will get a much fresher, better article for less cost, the producer get a much better price, and the unnecessary middleman's profit be eliminated; I favor reserving unto the States the power to raise revenues by the general sales tax and excise taxes so that by these taxes, reasonable income taxes and other similar taxes the State legislatures can relieve the people of the cities, counties, and States of a large part or all of the now too heavy and burdensome ad valorem or property tax.

I favor a system of insurance of bank deposits so worked out as to preserve and provide for the return of the small independent community bank with its local interest and official control, and I oppose any scheme by whatever name or for whatever alleged purpose which will bring about a complete centralization of all banking and bank control and bank ownership in two or three chain-bank monopolies with headquarters in Wall Street, New York. I favor a system of loans on farm products, farm property, and other home property, and so forth, which can be increased, diminished, paid off, or renewed within the amount of security offered, at will of borrower and without cost, bonuses, commissions, or other charges, thus causing our currency to expand or contract in unison with the property value of our people and giving full weight and credit to farm products as property. I favor a square deal for and preservation of our railroads as a transportation system for our people, a tax-producing medium for our cities, counties, and States, medium of employment of labor, and an important integral economic unit of our national financial fabric—all this along lines so often heretofore detailed by me. I favor honesty in business, in banking, in government, in the courthouses, in State governments, and in the National Government, the strictest economy and absolute good faith and highest loyalty of all officials in all capacities everywhere, at all times. And as I have repeatedly set forth and urged, I favor a mutual contract system of controlling production and marketing of tobacco, cotton, and other basic farm products, so as to elevate and stabilize the producers' selling price of these products, thus putting the farmer on a parity with other enterprises and enabling him to name the price of his products as fully and completely as others name the price of their manufactured articles.

Mr. Chairman, these principles just mentioned are so fully and inseparably part of my very being, heart, and soul, that all the Democratic conventions of the past, present, and future by all their platform pledges can not in the least shake my faith in them. My belief in them can only be changed by my conscience being led to a new conclusion by the dawn of "more light" or a better understanding.

They are now my best thought as God has given me to see the light. I am always willing for the light to break through, and if I am wrong I will be glad for some one to show me my error.

Mr. Chairman, if I was now announcing these principles for the first time, they would be only the mockery of despair and the ashes of bitter failure; but not so; every word, every vote, every official act, every amendment offered by me, every bill introduced by me, and every official act of mine are in strictest accord with these tenets and sacred pledges of mine. I sincerely believe in them and will continue to fight for them as long as I live unless they are adopted or I learn of something better. No amount of opposition will change my abiding faith in these principles which I honestly believe to be for the best interest of my country.

Mr. Chairman, during these trying times no man, either in or out of Congress, should seek election to this honorable body unless he is duly and truly prepared, worthy, and well qualified to fight to the last ditch for certain well-defined, clear-cut principles which he honestly feels have within them the healing of the present awful crisis. I am dumfounded to find men, even in these terrible times, seeking to come to Congress with apparently no reason except the desire to be elected or to defeat some one.

I plead with the voters of the Nation to demand of all candidates a clear-cut statement of what they stand for and not let them get away with some vague ideas from a party platform or suggested by their leaders for political reasons and offered only to get votes and then be forgotten. It is certainly no time for equivocation or soft pedaling on the question of solving the present awful condition.

I repeat, I feel Congress should not adjourn without enacting some real legislation for the veterans, the farmers, and the workingmen. I certainly will not vote to adjourn until we do more—yes, much more than has been accomplished. Much has been done for the big interests. They got all they asked for, with one exception. Now, are farmers and laboring men to be turned away with nothing? God forbid such a course.

The proposed relief bills, if passed, may help some, but will not at all give the real permanent relief that is so much needed. The farm proposals that are now being pushed—not to be passed but solely and only for political purposes—are either only experimental or of slight merit and do not at all constitute real farm relief.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, it happens that Florida is particularly interested in the provision of this bill which will authorize the lending of funds for the financing of crops which may be harvested this year or in 1933.

We have had an excessive drought in our State extending over almost the entire State. The strawberry crop and the truck crops, as well as the fruit crops that we hoped would bring large revenues to our State, have fallen short of our expectations.

Now and during the next few weeks is our strawberry-planting season. Strawberry growers find themselves unable to obtain local finances. The drought has now been broken. The passage of this bill would bring to them the necessary relief and enable them to purchase plant, fertilizer, and meet other expenses in connection with growing their crops.

It happens that last spring the Department of Agriculture was very slow—necessarily so, possibly—in setting up the necessary machinery to make the loans for spring planting. Therefore, the closing time for applications for loans came before thousands of our Florida people were able to make application. So, many of them will now be able to obtain these loans and plant their crops this summer and this fall. The growers of peppers, cucumbers, tomatoes, beans, and other vegetables, particularly in the Everglades section, will be able to harvest their crops as a result of this planting before 1933, but this will not obtain with the strawberry growers. Their crop, as you know, will not be harvested until December of this year, or until January, February, and even as late as April of 1933. The strawberry growers in my home county are in great need of these loans, because the crop harvested this spring was short on account of a drought of many months' duration.

So it seems to me passage of the bill is fully justified, because it will not require additional Federal appropriation. Only $65,000,000 of the $200,000,000 turned over to the Department of Agriculture last spring has been loaned. No new appropriation is required, and the bill will enable the department to loan existing funds for the purpose intended, and carry relief to the farmers for the next few months.

I hope the bill will pass.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KETCHAM].

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, two observations occur to me in connection with this legislation which I am very happy to support. The first one is in answer to the criticism made by some who have complained that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has not yet extended the benefits it was expected to bring to those who are quite far removed from what are known as the great centers of population. I think we have been too impatient for immediate results, and I have great faith to believe that before many weeks have passed the work of that fine organization will manifest itself more generally over the country. In the meantime, however, I am happy to know that the Committee on Banking and Currency and the Committee on Rules have brought this measure before us for consideration.

I agree absolutely with the statement made by the gentleman from Kentucky; that is to say, we must provide some means whereby the men upon the farms as well as the men who were formerly employed in such large numbers in factories may become active producers. I believe this bill will help many individual producers of the country to get started on the road that we wish to travel so very rapidly, and that in passing this bill we will have done the very best thing that can be done. Therefore I am happy indeed to give my most cordial and earnest support to this meritorious measure. Like the gentlemen who preceded me, I express the hope there will not be an adverse vote cast against the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the first proviso in the second paragraph of section 2 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act is amended by inserting after the words "crop production" a comma and the words "crop planting, or crop cultivation, including summer fallowing."

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the two provisos in the second paragraph of section 2 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act and the two sentences following the second of such provisos are amended to read as follows: 'Provided, That $50,000,000 of the amount so subscribed, and the expansion of same through the notes, debentures, bonds, or other obligations, as set out in section 9, shall be allocated and made available to the Secretary of Agriculture, which sum, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be expended by the Secretary of Agriculture for the purpose of making loans or advances to farmers in the several States of the United States in cases where he finds that an emergency exists as a result of which farmers are unable to obtain loans for crop or livestock production, including poultry, or to carry on dairy farming, or for crop planting or crop cultivation, including summer fallowing, during the year 1932: Provided further, That the Secretary of Agriculture shall give preference in making such loans or advances to farmers who suffered from crop failures in 1931. Such advances or loans shall be made upon such terms and conditions and subject to such regulations as the Secretary of Agriculture shall prescribe. A first lien on all crops growing, or to be planted and grown, or on livestock, shall, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, be deemed sufficient security for such loan or advance. The Secretary of Agriculture is also authorized, in his discretion, to take such other or additional security as he may deem proper and sufficient for such loan or advance.'"

Amend the title.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES: On page 2, line 16, after the figures "1932," strike out the proviso down to and including the figures "1931," in line 18.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, this amendment simply eliminates the provision which provides that preference shall be given in making loans and advances to farmers who suffered from crop failures in 1931. Inasmuch as the funds are ample to permit the Secretary of Agriculture to take care of all loans to be anticipated there is no objection to the amendment and the committee will be glad to accept it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SABATH: On page 3, line 2, after the word "advance," insert the following:

"Provided further, That the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is hereby empowered and directed to make loans to States and municipalities to aid and enable them to provide relief and employment for the needy unemployed, upon terms and conditions not inconsistent with the provisons of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act: Provided, however, That if any State or municipality, in actual need of a loan for the purposes above stated, can not furnish the securities prescribed, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized to accept as security a pledge or assignment of any aid to be made in the future for highway or road purposes by the United States Government to any such State; but in no case shall the aggregate amount of the advances to any State exceed 5 per cent and to any municipality 3 per cent of (1) the authorized capital stock of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation plus (2) the aggregate amount of the bonds of the corporation authorized."

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. SABATH. Yes; I desire to be heard. The bill before us provides that $50,000,000 may be used for the relief of agriculture and it authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to use it to make loans in certain instances. My amendment authorizes the making of loans to municipalities and consequently I think it is not subject to a point of order. I think it is an amendment that follows the provisions of the bill.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I would like to suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that the title of this act is:

To provide that advances under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act may be made for crop planting or crop cultivation, including summer fallowing, during the year 1932.

This is an amendment to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act and the gentleman's amendment is an amendment to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act. The necessity which confronts the gentleman's city also confronts my city, St. Louis, and the people of his city and the people of my city have, in a large degree, by reason of the payment of an enormous amount of taxes, made it possible to make loans to the farmers. Therefore, the people of the city should have an opportunity to get some relief. We are in favor of helping the farmer, and I am sure the farmer wants us to have needed relief.

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman is right. The needs of the people of the cities are as great as the needs of the people on the farm. In view of the fact that this bill extends the power of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make loans and authorizes the making of loans to the farmers, I do not see how a point of order could be sustained against my amendment.

My amendment provides for the making of loans to municipalities and also provides that proper security shall be given, subject to the rules and regulations prescribed by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Mr. LANHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. LANHAM. If this amendment should be declared in order and should prevail, would it be possible for municipalities, which have issued bonds for projects that would give employment, if carried on, to borrow on those bonds from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation?

Mr. SABATH. That is my aim. I think if the gentleman will read the amendment or will familiarize himself with the amendment, he will come to the conclusion that that would be possible. It is intended to create employment and at the same time bring about needed relief to the various municipalities.

Mr. LANHAM. Of course, I only heard the amendment read from the Clerk's desk, but I assumed it would permit that.

Mr. SABATH. It would, and it would immensely relieve conditions.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, in order to keep the record straight, may I say that if the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois were introduced as an amendment to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act it would clearly be in order. It would be germane to the whole act, but the bill before us amends a part of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act and the only question is whether or not an amendment in one particular can be enlarged by another amendment to a part of the act.

Mr. SABATH. Supplementing what the gentleman from New York has said I desire to say that the bill before us extends the power of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make additional loans.

My amendment provides for making additional loans to those provided for in the bill and consequently I feel the amendment is in order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. RAYBURN). The Chair is ready to rule.

The Chair thinks the proposition contained in the Senate bill before the House is for a specific purpose. Therefore the Chair is of the opinion that an amendment offered to make it general is not germane to the bill and therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GILCHRIST: On page 2, lines 13 and 14, strike out the words "livestock production" and insert in lieu thereof "producing and raising livestock."

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, since the amendment was prepared I have had some assurances from those in charge of the bill that the amendment is not necessary. In a colloquy I had a few minutes ago with the chairman of the committee I asked if the words "livestock production" could be construed to include the vaccination of hogs. Out in my country it is necessary to vaccinate the swine, and it is a very deplorable and wicked thing if the hogs are not vaccinated, but are allowed to die. Is this livestock production? It seems to me there could be no objection to the amendment, which simply includes producing and raising livestock, and surely the words "raising livestock" would include what I have in mind.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILCHRIST. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to state that this language was employed after consultation with the leading representatives of farm and livestock and dairy organizations in this country, together with the chief of the Bureau of Dairy Industry and other experts upon the subject. This is the language suggested by them as being sufficient to cover the entire subject and the entire operation of livestock production, and it is a simple amendment. The way the act was before, it was for crop production, and there is inserted crop or livestock production, and they insist that this covers everything relating to raising, caring for, feeding, doctoring, or anything else relating to the subject.

Mr. KETCHAM. If the gentleman will permit, if the word "production" did not have the meaning which the gentleman has suggested, we would not have such a thing as surplus production. The mere planting of a crop could not be construed as production, and therefore there can be no question about the language covering what the gentleman has in mind.

Mr. DAVIS. I think this language is broader than to undertake to use some other words to cover the situation.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, I wished to bring the question before the House in order that we might know the interpretation that would be given the language here, and with the statements of the gentlemen of the committee I am willing to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. JENKINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILCHRIST. Yes.

Mr. JENKINS. In that connection, I may say that I had something that bothered me along the same line as the question that is bothering the gentleman from Iowa; and as the gentleman recalls, I interrogated the chairman of the committee and one other gentleman as to whether or not "crop production" included the production of orchards and the crops of orchards. Since that time I have called up the Department of Agriculture, inasmuch as I did not get an entirely satisfactory answer from the gentlemen, and they tell me they have interpreted the words "crop production" in the broadest possible sense, and that it includes the production of orchards and vineyards, and I take it from this statement that the same interpretation would apply to what the gentleman has in mind.

Mr. GILCHRIST. I thank the gentleman. I wanted to get such a statement in the RECORD.

I ask unanimous consent that I may withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment is withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of this bill. This bill comes back to where we were when we first had up the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill. This bill proposes to make the loans direct to the farmer himself.

You will recall that when we had up the bill before, the chairman of the committee and the author of the bill offered an amendment like this, but it was held by the chairman to be not germane. I am pleased that we have come back to the proposition now and that these loans are to be made direct to the farmer himself.

I want to say to you that in my opinion loans made direct to the farmer bring the very best results that could be brought about by the use of this capital.

I believe further that the amount of money authorized by the next Congress ought to be made into a revolving fund that may be used forever hereafter for the benefit of agriculture when it is needed, and in the sum of $150,000,000, as authorized in this bill.

There is no business that is now suffering like agriculture, and yet we know that the whole fabric of our Government rests upon that industry. When we come back to the next session of the Congress we ought to consider measures that will put agriculture on a plane and a basis of safety where it ought to forever rest.

I desire now to call attention to a bill which I introduced three or four days ago, for the purpose of having it studied. It looks to the redemption of mortgages, taxes, and judgment liens on agricultural land. If you will take the papers from over your districts and from all over the United States, you will find to-day that about half of the lands that are in use for agriculture have been sold and bought in largely by the State or by others, because the farmer himself could not even pay the taxes on them. My bill looks to the redemption of this land and the correction of this condition with respect to farm land.

I am heartily in favor of this measure, and I believe the measure will give some relief to agriculture.

Mr. BEAM. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I believe this is a real, progressive measure. For I am satisfied and convinced that there is no industry in the country to-day which needs stabilization and encouragement more than agriculture.

I am certain, and I am sure that everybody in this Chamber recognizes, that unless agriculture is successful, and unless the farmer obtains the cost of production and a reasonable profit for his crops, that no industry, irrespective of kind and notwithstanding where it is situated, can prosper.

I want to say to the friends of agriculture that I am absolutely in favor of this legislation. I advocate forcibly every measure which will restore agriculture to a sound basis, because I recognize that agriculture is the bulwark of our commercial, industrial, and financial stability.

I also want to take this opportunity, Members of the Congress, to call your attention, and I do so parenthetically, to the fact that we who come from the great metropolitan areas of the United States, we who come from the great cities of the land, have always on the floor of this House and in the Committee on Agriculture, advocated and supported every measure for the benefit of the farmers in this country.

If I may be permitted to digress for a moment, I call your attention to the fact that in the great cities throughout the country there exists an intolerable situation—one which can justly and truly be classed as a national calamity.

In the great city of Chicago there is destitution, suffering, and want, and unless Federal aid is forthcoming very shortly, I fear for the grave and serious consequences which will surely follow. That is not only true in Chicago but applies to every large city throughout the United States. So I want to state to my agricultural friends that we of the great metropolitan areas of the country join them in their attempt to bring remedial legislation to the farmers of the country, and we hope and trust that the representatives of agriculture will join with us in our attempt to bring some relief to our cities.

Ninety-seven per cent of the amount of resources available for charitable expenditures have been expended in the city of Chicago. Six hundred thousand to seven hundred thousand people are fed by our charitable agencies; and if this relief is not forthcoming, disaster will ensue.

So I say, let us get some action on the Wagner bill. Let us bring some relief for the great metropolitan areas of our land, and in doing that we will relieve to some degree the feeling of trepidation and fear which has fallen upon the people of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 14, after the word "farming" and the comma, insert "or for crop harvesting or crop marketing or crop processing."

Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment, that it is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I will briefly explain the amendment, although I think it explains itself. The provision of the bill under consideration is comprehensive in providing for crop production, but some sections find difficulty in raising funds for crop marketing. Take the large institutions, some of the produce exchanges, and institutions of that kind, where the banks and financial institutions are so affected by frozen assets that they are not able to finance marketing operations as formerly, the institutions themselves find difficulty in carrying into the market the crops which you are undertaking to help in producing. It seems to me that it is perfectly proper to go one step farther and assist those, where the emergency exists, who desire to market or process their crops.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND. Yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. In view of the construction placed upon these laws by the department, and the regulation prescribed for their operation, does not the gentleman think it would be advisable to make this just as explicit as possible?

Mr. BLAND. I certainly do, because I happen to know that efforts have been made to take advantage of the laws already passed for this purpose, and persons desiring it have not been able to get relief.

Mr. BARBOUR. I agree with the gentleman, and I favor his amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. Does the gentleman have in mind canning factories, for instance?

Mr. BLAND. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS. The trouble about that is that this fund might be easily dissipated in loaning to enterprises of that kind without anything being left for the farmer. The other provisions of the act authorize this. This is restricted to direct loans to farmers.

Mr. BLAND. The farmers themselves are engaged in many cases in the operation of small canneries. I realize that probably the language of the amendment may need some clarification, but it will be in the hands of distinguished gentlemen in the conference who would be able to work out that problem.

Mr. STEAGALL. In handling these loans heretofore, it has been the custom of the Department of Agriculture to cooperate with the farmers in preparing crops for marketing. For instance, the cotton farmers have been permitted to withhold a sufficient amount to pay for ginning and the bagging of their cotton in preparation for its marketing. Certainly in dealing direct with the farmers I do not believe there will be any necessity for the amendment suggested by the gentleman. Of course we do not wish to extend the operations of this provision to general manufacturing.

Mr. BLAND. I realize that.

Mr. BARBOUR. Could not that be taken care of by limiting loans for crop processing to cooperatives composed of producers of these crops?

Mr. BLAND. I would be entirely willing to accept an amendment of that kind to my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. This bill seems complicated enough without the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia. The bill provides a very devious and grapevine system of financing. First, we loan $50,000,000 to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Then we borrow it back to loan it to somebody else who will pay it back to the bankers, who have already borrowed from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. It reminds me of the prohibition plank in the Republican platform adopted at the convention presided over by that grand old bouncer, BERT SNELL, who threw out the only man in his right senses in the convention, Doctor France. Of course Doctor France was about to do an unholy thing in mentioning the sacred name of Calvin Coolidge in that convention. I repeat, this bill by a system of financing is just as straight as the Republican plank on prohibition, just as straight as a corkscrew. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. We often provide machinery whereby credit may be obtained, where the credit obtained is not used advisedly. In view of the manner in which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has been working, it seems to me that the provision contained in this bill is a very desirable provision and should be enacted into law. Some of the gentlemen who have spoken on the bill have alluded to the general works program that has been proposed by certain Members of the House and the Senate. I am sure it is quite evident to the membership of the House and to this Congress that the Government can not undertake to furnish employment through Government funds to all of its idle citizens. The number of unemployed at present is too great for the Government to furnish a construction program that will be sufficient to keep them all employed. The Government must draw against resources of the people. In other words, the Government must raise the funds by Government bond issues, and those bond issues lay a levy against the tangible property owned by the people and the taxpayers. Government construction never does put into operation productive property. It is not productive construction that brings a return in the way of increased or created wealth.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman means productiveness so far as profit is concerned?

Mr. BUSBY. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. But there is productiveness so far as national welfare is concerned.

Mr. BUSBY. No; there is not anything except using funds that already have been piled up by the activities and labor of the people, and diverting those funds so as to employ somebody out of employment, and that is as far as it can go. Unemployment must be taken care of by private enterprise, by individuals, who set up factories and businesses of various kinds, and operate those businesses in each instance, believing that they have a business that is productive of wealth and that will bring them private income. That is how the unemployed must be employed.

The trouble with our country to-day, and you can pass it up as long as you want to, but you must ultimately come face to face with the proposition, is that the debts that we created in this country when we believed there was no end to the prosperity we were enjoying, when we would promise almost anything in return for some proposition presented to us without taking into consideration the services being rendered, are hampering progress at the present time, and that is the thing that we can not sidestep.

To that extent credit is fine; but often in times of diminishing commodity price, the country will be in worse position when the time comes to repay the thing that has been borrowed than it was before it was borrowed.

I notice in the United States Daily this morning a heading reading: "Commodity prices have shrunk 2 per cent during the month." So it must be evident also that if our commodity prices are continuing to shrink, the money we borrow in the light of present prices will be worth more and commodities worth less six months from now when these prices are materially less than when the money was borrowed.

I call attention to these things because to my mind they are worthy of consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

I am surprised that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] made a point of order against the amendment, which would afford relief for the large cities, offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH]. If there is any one State in the Union that has benefited by reason of the passage of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act, it is the State of Pennsylvania.

The newspapers that arrived from my home city this morning state that the charity organizations have been required to refuse to accept applications for future relief. I think we have conducted five drives in St. Louis to raise money to assist people in distress. We have reached the point where the city of St. Louis and the charitable organizations of that city sent a delegation here last week appealing to the Members of Congress to secure some kind of Government relief measure in which the city of St. Louis as a whole could participate.

It matters not to me whether it is the Garner bill or the Wagner bill or whose bill it is, but I say we can not adjourn until we have passed some kind of legislation to help the municipalities of this country.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BUSBY] spoke of a public-works program. Permit me to say to the gentleman that that is secondary to a relief program. I favor this legislation. I want to help the farmer, but why not also help the cities, where the taxes are collected which make it possible for us to help the farmer?

Mr. BUSBY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. BUSBY. I am not averse to helping the cities. I know the people in the cities are in more distress than we can possibly imagine. I know that nobody could be in more distress than those who do not have homes and are driven out of their rented quarters and have no employment. Poverty is an awful thing. It is something that a great many of our people can not help at the present time. I am not averse to assisting, but I was simply talking about the economic value of the proposal as I saw it.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The gentleman stated, however, that private industry—factories—must relieve the unemployment situation.

Mr. BUSBY. I did not state it just that way.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. How can the people of the cities and the country buy the products of the factories unless the earning power of the people is increased? What good will be accomplished by operating the factories if clothing and shoes and machinery which the factories make can not be sold? That is our trouble to-day. The earning power is gone. Let the Government lead the way and provide some earning power for the masses.

What I am directly interested in now is the necessity of passing some kind of legislation to relieve distress in the cities and to make it possible for the large cities of this country to meet the situation that confronts them. They are at the end of the rope. They are unable to raise more money to take care of those who are in distress. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND].

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard in opposition to that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The debate has been exhausted on the amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

The CHAIRMAN. That would not be in order, because that is an amendment in the third degree.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia and all amendments thereto close at the end of five minutes.

Mr. SNOW. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I have been seeking recognition for 20 minutes. I would like an opportunity to speak for five minutes.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I amend my request by making it 10 minutes. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee that he be allowed to address the committee for five minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of the friends of this measure to the fact that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND] goes far beyond the purpose and purview of the pending bill.

Section 2 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act provides for direct loans to farmers. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND] proposes to include within the number who may borrow those funds those engaged in processing and other things. That will include, as the gentleman admitted, canning factories. It will include cotton and textile mills. It will include any character of enterprise whatever engaged in processing or marketing agricultural products.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS. I yield.

Mr. BLAND. The language of the gentleman's amendment limited it to farming. My amendment simply says "for these purposes." How can it go beyond farmers, then?

Mr. DAVIS. Well, if it can not do that, the amendment does not mean anything.

Mr. BLAND. The gentleman knows that farmers are engaged in this business just as well as I do.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield further. If there are any such instances, they are not engaged in farming, or they are engaged in it to such a limited extent that the fund, in the final analysis, would not go to the class for which it is intended.

Now, another thing, if this amendment is adopted it probably will result in the defeat of this very important legislation either in the Senate or perhaps by a veto, and those of us who are interested in this important legislation going through can not afford to let it be weighted down with amendments which can have no other purpose.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will not the effect of this amendment be to withdraw the money that was originally intended for the farmers and divert it to the merchandising business?

Mr. DAVIS. Absolutely; that is what I say.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is a violation of the very principle before the committee.

Mr. DAVIS. This is the one and only provision of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act that proposes to give any aid to those engaged in agriculture. The balance of that fund is in the interest of other industries. We must preserve this for agriculture, which is the largest industry, and in which a larger number of people are engaged than any other industry. These people are in just as prostrate condition, to say the least, as any other class of citizens.

Mr. MOUSER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS. I yield.

Mr. MOUSER. This legislation is practical in its provision of relief for the farmer rather than theoretical. I hope it is not disturbed, because it will carry out the purpose of the committee to give practical relief to the farmer.

Mr. DAVIS. The friends of the farmers and the friends of this legislation can not afford to let it be defeated by any such amendment as this, and I hope all such amendments will be voted down.

Mr. SNOW. Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope the amendment just offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND] is not adopted. Should it be, it will eventually kill the bill.

The bill as drawn should be passed.

It is simply a corrective bill and takes care of and remedies the rather unhappy wording of some of the lines in the original bill. In other words, if this bill is passed we will be getting what we thought we were getting when the original bill was passed.

I myself had occasion to confer with the Department of Agriculture regarding its construction of certain provisions of this bill and I am especially pleased that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL], the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS], and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HILL] have seen fit to have this bill we are now considering brought before the House at this time.

The passage of this bill is absolutely necessary if we are to get what we thought we were getting before.

The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. GARBER] a few moments ago said he felt it his duty to stand up and defend the Secretary of Agriculture from criticism as to his construction of some of these provisions. This defense is unnecessary. No such criticism has been made. Our colleague from Oklahoma undoubtedly misunderstood the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS]. In his statement Judge Davis made no criticism of the Secretary of Agriculture but simply stated what the Secretary's construction was.

Mr. Hyde did not draw the original bill and is not responsible for its wording or shortcomings.

In his concluding remarks the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. GARBER] criticized the majority members of the Committee on Agriculture for not reporting out some farm-relief measures during this session. I am perfectly willing for the Democratic Party to be criticized when it deserves it, but I am not willing, even as a Republican, to sit here in silence and allow the Democratic members of this committee to be criticized on a matter of which I have special knowledge when that criticism is unjust.

I say to the gentlemen on both sides of the aisle, that if any committee has ever worked, and worked hard, in an attempt to do something or to report out some bills that would afford relief to the farmers of this country, it has been the present House Committee on Agriculture. [Applause.]

We have sat day in and day out and have been patient listeners. Under the able leadership of our highly respected chairman, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES], this committee accorded hearings to representatives of every major farm organization, to every class of farmer in this country, to college professors and editors, to cattlemen, and even to long and short sellers.

And at the end of six months we found ourselves just about where we were when we started.

We were at our wits' end and were greatly in doubt as to the efficacy of any of the proposals made.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNOW. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. SABATH. Is it not a fact that the leaders of the three great farm organizations were unable to agree on any proposition, and that that is what is responsible for the delay in agricultural relief legislation?

Mr. SNOW. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] has asked a fair question and is entitled to a frank answer. One of these organizations advocated the debenture, the second the equalization fee, and the third the so-called Simpson allotment plan, which, by the way, should not be confounded with the so-called Wilson allotment plan. This naturally confused the whole situation as far as the committee was concerned and led nowhere. Apparently being unable to agree on any one of these three plans, the representatives of these three farm organizations recently urged our committee to report out a bill embodying all three of these plans. After more or less discussion such a bill was with reluctance—and I say this advisedly—reported out, but not by a unanimous vote. From what information I have been able to obtain, this bill will be brought before the House the first of next week.

In concluding let me say that I voted against this bill in committee and propose to fight it on the floor of the House.

In my opinion, it is a mixture of nonsense, class legislation, and subsidies. It would cost the consuming public a billion dollars a year. It would benefit the producers of four or five farm products at the most and eventually increase the surplus in each of these favored crops. It would be manifestly unfair to the farmers of the country not engaged in raising these four or five products. It is visionary. It is no good and ought to be thrown out of the window the minute it appears here in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KLEBERG: Page 2, line 14, after the word "production" and before the word "including," insert the words "and feeding."

Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. RAYBURN). The Chair thinks that under the bill livestock production would certainly include feeding and therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Chairman, I hope the chairman of the committee will pay particular attention to my effort, as one who has had experience for many years in the handling of livestock, to show just what this amendment means to this particular piece of legislation.

There seems to be a misconception in the minds of some of the members of the committee as to whether or not this language would strengthen the bill. I will not take much of your time, but I want to call your attention to the difference between the meaning of the words "livestock production" and the words "livestock feeding."

It so happens that for many years I have been engaged in working on, managing, and assisting in the managing of a large cattle ranch. We produce on that ranch a great many cattle. In so far as feeding bills are concerned and the borrowing of money for livestock feeding is concerned, that does not happen in our section of the country very often. Only serious drought conditions ever occasion the necessity for a ranchman to borrow money for the feeding of his stock in any section in the southern part of Texas. Livestock feeding, my friends, is dependent upon whether or not the man who feeds livestock as a business can finance himself through those who raise and produce cattle, and it is dependent upon whether or not there is a sale for the livestock. I fear that the group which will actually carry this legislation into effect, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and its subsidiaries, when approached by a man who desires to borrow money for the purpose of livestock feeding, will not be willing to make such loans unless these words are specifically provided in the bill.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KLEBERG. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS. I will ask the gentleman if it would be possible to have livestock production without feeding, and whether the gentleman is familiar with the well-known principle of law that if you undertake to designate the application of anything you are restricted to the designated words?

Mr. KLEBERG. I understand that thoroughly.

Mr. DAVIS. Livestock production is regarded by all of the experts as covering the entire operation from the very beginning to the end.

Mr. KLEBERG. In answer to the gentleman from Tennessee let me give him a definite illustration. Six weeks ago an effort was made by a friend of mine to borrow money through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation prior to the closing of this particular fund, which was closed, I believe, on April 30. He desired to borrow that money for the purpose of feeding livestock, but he could not get any money. However, it so happened that a ranchman who was producing livestock was enabled to borrow money. The purpose of my amendment is to show the particular agency which will loan this money the difference and distinction between the man who is not anything other than a livestock producer and the man who is a livestock feeder. The livestock feeder is an entirely different individual from the man who produces livestock. The livestock feeder may be a farmer who produces no livestock and in ninety cases out of a hundred he is a farmer. He raises corn and he sells that corn through being able to buy two or three carloads of livestock on the market and feed that corn to the livestock.

He is not a livestock producer in the strict sense of the word; and if you want the man in the Corn Belt to sell his corn and if you want the man who has feed in his barns to be able to utilize it, then adopt this language, because the provision as now in the bill does not cover that phase. [Applause.]

It is contended that the term "livestock production" is regarded by all experts as covering the entire operation from the very beginning to the end. Let us see if it does: I am a farmer. I have listened to my banker, who advises me to put 25 per cent of my farm into feed. The county agent also advises me to this end, and suggests that I plant corn or maize. I follow the advice of both of them and raise a good crop, which I harvest and put in my barn. I then discover that the price on the market for my grain is too low to pay the cost of production. I have no livestock, and I am advised by the county agent to purchase some and feed my grain in the bins to the cattle and hogs. Do the gentlemen on the committee still contend that the term "livestock production," as contained in the bill, would enable me to borrow the money to purchase the livestock? No; I do not think that provision covers this situation, which is common throughout the farming districts of our country. It might be possible for the farmer who desires to feed some milk calves which he has produced, to borrow money for the purchase of feed; but the man who must be helped—the dirt farmer—who would profit immeasurably by being able to finance livestock through which to market his feed, and at the same time retain the fertility of the soil on his farm, is in my opinion denied the assistance which he so vitally needs at present.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the committee amendment and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment and the committee amendment be closed in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of this bill.

We have discussed many questions and many problems during this session of Congress for the purpose of relieving the economic condition of our country. Agriculture, as is well known, is the basic industry upon the success of which depends all other classes of business. When agriculture succeeds all classes of people succeed to a large extent.

I hope this bill will not be impaired or injured by unnecessary amendment. There has been much talk about relief legislation at this session. During this depression, when the farmers are unable to borrow money from the banks or from anyone else, I think it is most wholesome legislation for us to provide for loans by the Government to farmers. We have done that and this bill extends that authority.

The people of Alabama, whom I represent in part, are vitally interested in this legislation, for one reason especially. They are now engaged very largely in truck gardening, the raising of strawberries and things of that kind, and this bill as amended by the committee will give them relief by lending them money for the purpose of preparing crops in 1932 which will not mature until 1933.

Mr. Chairman, I am afraid if we amend the bill too much we will destroy the good that is to be gotten out of it. [Applause].

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KLEBERG].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. KLEBERG) there were—ayes 36, noes 39.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I have sent to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BARBOUR: Page 2, line 14, after the word "farming" and the comma insert "or for crop harvesting or crop marketing by cooperative associations composed of farmers."

Mr. DAVIS and Mr. STAFFORD reserved a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this legislation is to help farmers turn their crops into money. The laws that we enact here are frequently so hedged in with rules and regulations by the departments administering them that the intent of Congress in passing the legislation is not carried out. We can not make these laws too specific. If we are going to help the farmers turn their crops into money, we should help them not only to produce crops but we should help them cultivate those crops; we should help them harvest those crops, and where they have associations composed of farmers for the purpose of marketing the crops, we should help them market them and carry the crop from the time it is planted right through the farmer's hands until it reaches the market. This is the sole purpose of my amendment and the amendment would make the act specific in that regard.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS. What would be the difference between what the gentleman from California has in mind and the $500,000,000 fund that was made available for the Federal Farm Board to lend to cooperatives?

Mr. BARBOUR. I may say to the gentleman from Tennessee that this bill is for the purpose of helping the farmer produce crops. My amendment simply would help him to harvest the crop. It makes it specific by using the word "harvesting" and then goes a little further and would help farmers who are joined together in cooperative associations to market their crops, so they can turn their crops into money.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order the amendment is not germane. The pending bill is an amendment to section 2 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act which sets aside a fund for the sole and specific purpose of the Secretary of Agriculture advancing loans direct to individual farmers for crop and livestock productions. The amendment offered by the gentleman from California injects the matter of making loans to organizations for marketing purposes and not for crop production.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair thinks this amendment, in line with some others that have been offered, is an undue expansion of the terms of the bill from a direct loan to the individual farmer to loans to cooperatives, and, therefore, sustains the point of order.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I want to take this occasion to express my appreciation of the work done this session by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL], the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON], and the other members of the Banking and Currency Committee. They have been faced with numerous difficult and baffling problems that not only called for great industry but also for sound judgment.

I doubt whether any committee in a generation has been called upon in a single session to face and solve so many tremendous problems. I have often marveled at their ability to stand the physical strain. This has been a very strenuous session, but more than their share of work has, by force of circumstances, been heaped upon them. These able gentlemen have performed a number of difficult tasks in such a way as to merit unstinted praise.

It was my privilege to offer the amendment to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act definitely allocating $200,000,000 to the House for agricultural loans. This amendment was adopted by the House. Prior thereto an amendment by Senator SMITH to a similar bill had been adopted, setting apart $50,000,000 for direct loans to farmers for crop-production purposes.

Through the fine work of the House conferees and the Senate conferees working together the two amendments were blended. The larger amount provided in the House amendment was agreed to. The method of distribution provided in the Senate amendment was adopted, and the two as blended and worked out by the conferees were agreed to, reported to, and adopted by both the House and Senate, and were written into law.

I am sure that it was the intention of everyone who had a part in this allocation that these funds should be available for loans throughout the year 1932.

Through the construction, however, of the Department of Agriculture the loans were limited to crop production which would be completed during the year 1932.

Without passing on the correctness of that interpretation, the purpose of this measure is to broaden the provisions so that the first intentions might be carried out.

I think that the broader provisions of House Joint Resolution 352, which I have introduced, should be adopted, as this would continue the operations on a sound basis during the life of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act. However, the pending measure will accomplish a good portion of the same purpose for the balance of this year, and further action along the lines of the broader measure may be taken at the next session of Congress.

In adjusting the differences between the House and Senate amendments in the original reconstruction act, as well as in ironing out the differences as to other difficult parts of that very important enactment, the conferees were called upon to do a great deal of detail work in addition to their other activities. The House appreciates the hard work done by these able gentlemen, and I am sure the country appreciates it. At least, those who are familiar with the facts will do so. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment as amended.

The committee amendment was adopted.

Under the rule, the committee rose, and Mr. RAINEY, Speaker pro tempore, having resumed the chair, Mr. RAYBURN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the committee had had under consideration the bill (S. 4780) to provide that advances under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act may be made for crop planting or crop cultivation, including summer-fallowing, during the year 1932, and had directed him to report the same back with an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion by Mr. STEAGALL, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 11897) entitled "An act making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes," disagreed to by the House; agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon and appoints Mr. REED, Mr. JONES, Mr. CUTTING, Mr. KENDRICK, and Mr. MCKELLAR to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 11452, making appropriations for the Navy Department and naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore appointed as conferees on the part of the House, Mr. AYRES, Mr. OLIVER of Alabama, Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona, Mr. FRENCH, and Mr. TABER.

CONFERENCE REPORT ON LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference on the bill (H. R. 11267) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes, for printing under the rule.

Mr. STAFFORD. When is it the purpose of the gentleman to take up the conference report?

Mr. McDUFFIE. We hope to take it up on Monday.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Is it a full agreement?

Mr. McDUFFIE. It is not a full agreement. The conferees have agreed on every amendment except No. 41, which deals with the question of salary reductions.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Is the gentleman going to give the House an opportunity to have something to say on some of the items placed in it by the Senate?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Oh, yes.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. What will be the vote on Monday?

Mr. McDUFFIE. On the adoption of the conference report and such other questions as the House may see fit to consider.

GRAND CENTRAL STATION POST OFFICE, NEW YORK

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 257.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 257

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 12360, a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to enter into a contract to purchase the parcel of land and the building known as the Grand Central Station Post Office and Office Building, No. 452 Lexington Avenue, in the city, county, and State of New York, for post-office and other governmental purposes, and to pay the purchase price therefor on or prior to June 30, 1937.

That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 30 minutes, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. O'CONNOR. How much time does the gentleman from Massachusetts desire?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. If the gentleman from New York will yield us the usual time, we shall try not to use much of it.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman from Massachusetts 30 minutes. This is a rule for the consideration of a bill authorizing the Government to enter negotiations for the purchase of the Grand Central Post Office in New York City. That post office is one of the most important ones in the country.

The lease upon it expires next year, and it is suggested it would be advantageous for the Government to enter into negotiations now for the purchase of the building, not to be paid for until 1937, and that in the interim years the same amount be paid annually as is now paid for rent. Therefore there will be no immediate cost to the Government. The authorization is necessary in view of the situation in New York.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. We will not use any time on the rule, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12360) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to enter into a contract to purchase the parcel of land and the building known as the Grand Central Station Post Office and Office Building, No. 452 Lexington Avenue, in the city, county, and State of New York, for post-office and other governmental purposes, and to pay the purchase price therefor on or prior to June 30, 1937.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 12360, with Mr. WEST in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, under the rule, half of the time allotted is to be under the control of the ranking minority member of the committee. In view of the fact that the ranking minority member of the committee is unavoidably absent, I ask unanimous consent that the time to have been used by him may be controlled by the next ranking member on the minority side, the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED].

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, this bill was very carefully considered by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and that committee has been able to see no practical solution of the present difficulty involved except that set forth in the terms of the measure and recommended by the Post Office Department. The Grand Central Post Office Station in New York houses and looks after principally all of the New England mail. However, it has to do with a great deal of mail that originates in and is received by other sections of the country. About 25 years ago the Government entered into a contract for postal quarters in New York to look after this great volume of business. Those quarters have been occupied continuously since that time, and it has been necessary now and then to lease additional space for this purpose. The lease which the Government now holds and upon which it is paying in round numbers $318,000 as an annual rental will expire on the 31st of December of next year. The building which is now being occupied is most advantageous for postal purposes because of the fact that the railroad tracks are immediately beneath it and the facilities for the handling of the mail are already available without any trucking.

When our lease expires the last of next year, it is doubtful whether the building can be re-leased at all, and also doubtful, in the second place, as to what the rental would be. It is doubtful whether the building could be leased at all because of the fact that an option is held on that building by private parties, but the Government can take steps to acquire the property. The option of the private parties is for a long-term lease, the title not to go out of the present owner. The building is a 6-story granite structure with a foundation sufficient to accommodate 10 or more additional stories. It is the purpose of the private parties who hold the option to use it as an office building and extend the building in the way indicated if they shall so acquire it. The building is large enough for our post-office purposes there, and it is the intention of the Government to remodel it and make the interior of it four stories instead of six in order to give adequate space for the working of the mail, and so forth, and to use the top floor for other Federal offices now located in New York and paying additional rentals elsewhere. If this building should not be acquired by the Government, it would be necessary at the expiration of the lease to get new quarters, and the testimony before us is to the effect that no new quarters could be acquired in that vicinity except at great expense and at great additional cost to the Government in the handling of the mail, because of the loading and unloading and trucking that would be necessary in that operation. Under these circumstances, that being one of the most important postal stations in the country, handling this great volume of mail, incoming and outgoing, and dealing with all of this great New England section, it seemed to the committee that the only reasonable thing to do was to recommend the provisions incorporated in this bill.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to enter into a contract, after full negotiation and investigation and appraisal, for the purchase of this building, the purchase price not to be paid until 1937, and the period from now until 1937 to be paid upon our rental basis, so that in effect it is an authorization through the terms of which for the next four years we shall continue to pay our rental and at the expiration of the four years acquire the building, provided satisfactory terms can be made to the Government and that the Congress will pass upon the appropriation and approve it.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. This station is used only for the transfer of mail, is it not? Is it a general post office?

Mr. LANHAM. The gentleman, I think, is incorrect in that inference. It is the regular post office that handles all of this mail, incoming and outgoing, especially with reference to New England. It has to do with the most important part and the most expensive part of the handling of the mail in the Postal Service.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Can the gentleman give any idea as to what the probable cost of this acquisition will be?

Mr. LANHAM. Not with great accuracy, but there is a maximum cost provided here, what is known as an upset value. Personally, I do not believe that the Government will pay that sum of money for this building. It is not in the contemplation of the committee that that maximum sum will be paid for this property, but there will be an accurate appraisal of it. It must be entirely satisfactory to the Government. All of the terms and all of the conditions must be satisfactory to the Government before entering into a contract, and a part of the money that will be expended will be for the interior alterations of the building to meet the needs for its use as a post office station.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. I yield.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. The gentleman knows that in the last session of Congress we passed a bill with general authority for the purchase of stations such as this Grand Central Station. It was passed by the House and failed in the Senate. The bill is now pending before the gentleman's committee, and it seems to me that that bill is comprehensive authority for doing what the Postmaster General has recommended, in the saving of some $7,000,000 of rentals now being paid.

Mr. LANHAM. Yes. This is a specific instance of trying to carry that through. There is precedent for it, I will say to the committee, in Public No. 794, of the Sixty-ninth Congress, which gave authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to enter into a contract to purchase, upon completion, a suitable building for customs and other governmental activities in the city of New York. That was approved on March 4, 1927. In other words, this is an authorization bill. For the next four years we will continue to pay our rentals, but our lease expires at the end of next year. Considerable time must be taken in the negotiations, especially in view of the fact that an option of the kind I have mentioned is held by private parties. The emergency nature of the measure is that, the owners of the property and the Government being quite a sum apart on what the one is willing to take and the other to give for the property, much time will likely be required in reaching an agreement, and it behooves us to act now to give this authority for the negotiations in order that the matter may be consummated one way or the other before the termination of our rental period.

Mr. MOUSER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. I yield.

Mr. MOUSER. It is very much to the interest of the Government to secure this appraisal now under present property values, because it can be acquired for much less now, when property values have depreciated, than it can later on.

Mr. LANHAM. Not only was that impressed upon the committee, that we might arrange to acquire it at a cheaper figure now than hereafter, but also that if we do not acquire it we must acquire some other property in the vicinity. There is none specially available in the immediate vicinity, and such property would cost just as much or more, and we would have, in the handling of the mails, tremendous additional expense in loading, unloading, and trucking, which is a very considerable item.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. I yield.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Did the gentleman state the amount of the rental now paid?

Mr. LANHAM. The annual rental now paid is $318,000 plus.

Mr. REED of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. I yield.

Mr. REED of New York. I just wanted to call attention to the fact that the only other available building in the vicinity that could possibly meet the needs is one somewhat removed from the station, and it would require blasting through solid rock for a considerable distance, which would necessitate a great engineering feat in order to accomplish it without destroying the building that we want now to get.

Mr. LANHAM. The gentleman is quite right. In order to have the underground access to any other building we might acquire, necessarily we should have to go through this operation of blasting through solid rock, which is a very expensive process. Furthermore, any other building that we could acquire would not have the advantage of this building, with the railroad tracks right under it, for thus the handling of the mail is facilitated and made much less expensive in time and money.

Mr. WATSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. Does the Secretary of the Treasury approve this measure, as well as the Postmaster General?

Mr. LANHAM. The statement of the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury was to the effect that they neither recommended nor opposed, but that they had discussed the matter with the post office authorities and understood it.

Mr. WATSON. Does the gentleman know how much will be saved by transportation?

Mr. LANHAM. Does the gentleman mean if we should go to another location?

Mr. WATSON. Yes.

Mr. LANHAM. I do not have those items before me, and they were not before the committee. The Post Office Deparment authorities said they could furnish them but they assured us that they would be very, very considerable; and, furthermore, they would be permanent.

Mr. CULLEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. I yield.

Mr. CULLEN. There is no other place available in that immediate section for the purpose of a post office, and the price they would have to pay would be 300 per cent more than what they pay now.

Mr. LANHAM. The testimony before the committee is that it would be much more expensive to go somewhere else, in addition to this added cost of loading and unloading and trucking the mail.

Mr. BLOOM. The gentleman should not forget the question of time in the handling of the mail, because the trains come right into the post office here.

There is no other place in this same vicinity where they could get the trains or cars into the post office.

Mr. LANHAM. Therefore there would be a great saving in time. In other words, Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that this lease expires next year, that we have no assurance of renewal, because private parties have an option for long-term rental, if the Government does not take some steps and give some authority to the officials here authorized to carry out these negotiations we are going to find ourselves in a rather chaotic situation in reference to all this New England mail at the expiration of next year.

Mr. BLOOM. And with respect to Canadian mail, too.

Mr. LANHAM. Where we would go for quarters and what they would cost we are unable to say.

Mr. REED of New York. Let me make another statement, if the gentleman will permit. This will involve no extra expenditure, because they are going to pay on the purchase price each year until 1937 the rental.

Mr. LANHAM. The testimony before the committee was that no appropriation other than the usual rental would be necessary from now until 1937.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I believe if I judge the temper of the House correctly at this time that it is ready to vote and that the Members are in favor of the bill.

I wish to give the bill my heartiest indorsement.

New York City is the greatest center for the distribution of mail in the world. The efficiency with which mail is handled at this point affects practically every community in the United States. A few minutes' delay in the transfer of mail in this great commercial center can lead to great inconvenience, touching commercial transactions in every city in this country. Broadly viewed, this is one reason this proposed legislation is here at this time.

The rapid increase in the volume of mail that flows to this point of distribution has required added facilities to properly handle it. The Government has been required from time to time to procure available space at high rentals to avoid congestion and delay in the steady flow of mail throughout the United States.

The leases entered into will soon expire, which makes it imperative to meet the problem of adequate space and at the same time avoid high transfer costs as well as high rentals.

The officials of the Post Office Department are to be commended for their forethought in giving careful study to this problem prior to the expiration of the present leases. After diligent and timely investigation the Post Office Department recommends this measure to authorize it to enter into a contract to purchase the one available building which is in every way suitable for the purpose desired. This building is known as the P. O. & O. Building, located at 452 Lexington Avenue. It is owned by the New York Central Railroad.

This building is six stories high, constructed of granite, and so planned that it can be increased to 10 stories.

The tracks of the New York Central, the New Haven & Hartford, and other railroads are built under this structure. It is the only building where these facilities are available.

The present annual rental paid by the Government under existing leases in the aggregate is $318,000. The limit of cost fixed in this bill for the purchase of this building is $15,500,000. To enter into new leases will entail higher rentals, and if other location should be selected, the extra cost of transferring the mail would be a tremendous cost and also involve great delay in handling mail.

The acquisition of this building will result in a retrenchment of annual Federal expenditures. It will provide space for other necessary governmental activities now located where high rentals are paid for the space required. It will place no extra burden upon the Government, for, under the terms of the bill, the payments annually on the purchase price shall not exceed the amount of rental now paid until 1937.

This bill comes to the House with a unanimous report of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. It has the approval of the Post Office Department. I believe that sound business practice fully justifies favorable action on this measure.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to enter into a contract to purchase on behalf of the United States the parcel of land with the building thereon located in the city, county, and State of New York, bounded by the westerly line of Lexington Avenue, the southerly line of Forty-fifth Street, a line parallel with and distant 275 feet, more or less, westerly of the westerly line of Lexington Avenue and a line parallel with and distant 220 feet 9½ inches, more or less, southerly of the southerly line of Forty-fifth Street, for a post-office building and/or for other governmental purposes, subject to the exception and reservation to the New York Central Railroad Co., its successors and assigns, of the perpetual rights of exclusive use for railroad station, terminal, and other purposes of the railroad company, its successors and assigns, of the subsurface of said parcel to be specifically defined in the instrument of conveyance, with the necessary ventilating shafts; and subject also to exceptions and reservations for purposes of light, air, and support in favor of said subsurface and the southerly and westerly adjoining premises, all as may be agreed upon in advance by the respective parties to the conveyance of title to the United States: Provided, however, That the total limit of cost to the United States of such parcel of land and building, including the cost of any necessary remodeling of said building, shall not exceed the sum of $15,500,000 and interest: Provided further, That the contract of purchase, if made, shall provide for the conveyance to the United States of title to said property on or prior to January 1, 1933, and for the payment of the agreed purchase price of said property on June 30, 1937, except that the Treasury Department, at its election, may pay any part of the agreed purchase price prior to said date, and except that commencing on the date of the conveyance of title to said property to the United States and continuing until January 1, 1934, there shall be paid each month to be applied on account of the agreed purchase price a sum not in excess of the aggregate monthly rental now paid by the Post Office Department for the spaces occupied by the Post Office Department in said building and in the adjacent buildings to the north and south, and except that commencing on January 1, 1934, and continuing to the date of the full payment of the agreed purchase price there shall be paid each month, to be applied on account of the agreed purchase price as aforesaid, a sum not less than one-twelfth of the product arrived at by multiplying the aggregate square-foot area of the spaces now occupied by the Post Office Department in said building and in the adjacent buildings to the north and south, by a rate per square foot to be agreed upon by the owner and the Secretary of the Treasury, not in excess of $2.50 per square foot and not less than the average rental per square foot now payable by the Post Office Department under the present leases of the spaces occupied by the Post Office Department in the said building and in the adjacent buildings to the north and south: Provided further, That any appropriations made or hereafter made to the Post Office Department for the payment of rent under the leases now in effect and hereinbefore mentioned shall, upon the conveyance of title to the United States, be available to the Secretary of the Treasury for the aforesaid monthly payments on account of the purchase price: Provided further, That the Treasury Department at the date of its payment of the full purchase price shall pay interest upon the unpaid balances of said purchase price to be computed from the date of the conveyance of title to said property to the date of the payment of the full purchase price at a rate not in excess of 4 per cent per annum to be agreed upon by the owner and the Secretary of the Treasury: And provided further, That all other terms and conditions in connection with the purchase of said property shall be in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word and ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I wanted to take this occasion to refer to a joint resolution I am about to introduce which affects every Member of this body and which affects the taxpayers of the several States and of their subdivisions.

My resolution amends the revenue act, just passed, and is for the purpose of saving the taxpayers of the several States and their subdivisions money that they should not be compelled to pay.

Congress should not tax the several States or their subdivisions for making purchases essential in the performance of a governmental duty; neither should the States tax the Federal Government. Yet, by the passage of the recent revenue act we are taxing the taxpayers not only of the several States, but also of their subdivisions.

Your State and my State, and their subdivisions, in the performance of their governmental duties, need to buy, for example, fire apparatus, or automobiles, or various other things for the conduct of governmental business that are taxed by the revenue act of 1932. If they buy directly from the manufacturer they do not have to pay the tax, but if they buy from a wholesaler, a jobber, or anyone other than a manufacturer, they have to pay the tax. In other words, there is no provision in the recent revenue act for a refund to the several States or their subdivisions for taxes paid on purchases for essential governmental purposes where the purchase was made from anyone other than a manufacturer. The present law unintentionally discriminates against the wholesaler and jobber, who is usually a local concern.

The law as it now stands imposes unnecessary and additional taxes upon the people of the several States and their subdivisions, which they should not be compelled to stand on any occasion, and which certainly they can not very well bear at this particular time. The members of the Ways and Means Committee, and the House, never intended to impose this tax. In the original bill reported out of committee we protected the taxpayers of the States and of local governments through the license system, which was a part of the manufacturers' excise tax, but when that went out it left the matter open. The result is that the bill as finally passed exempts the States and their subdivisions from taxes on purchases made from manufacturers, but where the State or a subdivision thereof makes a purchase for governmental purposes from anyone else—and I am not talking about the contractor to whom a contract has been awarded or with whom a contract has been made, but purchases made by the State, city, town, or community itself, through its duly elected officials, and made for local governmental purposes—from anyone other than a manufacturer, such purchases are taxed. When they are made from the wholesaler, the tax has to be paid and it has to be paid by your taxpayers and by the taxpayers of my State or city. In the course of a year it will mean many millions of dollars of additional expense to State and local government. I think we should save that money for our local taxpayers. I do not think the Members of Congress ever intended that the local taxpayers should be burdened with such taxes, particularly in times such as we are going through at present. Such a tax violates the intent and spirit of our dual system of government.

Although the bill does not specifically exempt in all cases the tax on purchases made from manufacturers, it will be taken care of by regulation by the Treasury Department, so I am reliably informed. The regulation of exemption is predicated upon the Constitution. However, constitutional provisions do not extend to wholesalers or jobbers, because the tax, under the 1932 act, will have already been paid by the manufacturer. My bill provides for a refund on necessary governmental purchases made by a State or city, thereby protecting the interests of the taxpayer of local government. What the Federal Government can not do directly should not be done indirectly. The principle of making a citizen pay additional taxes to local government to enable local government in turn to pay the same to the Federal Government is wrong. It is our duty to protect local government, our State, our city, county, and town against taxes that should not be imposed upon them. When we do that we are protecting our taxpayers.

Furthermore, we are preserving the dignity and integrity of our dual system of government. If it is right for the Federal Government to impose such taxes upon local government it is equally right for local government to assert the same principle against the Federal Government. For example, Massachusetts has a tax on gasoline. All purchases made in any way by the Federal Government are exempt, through a refunding provision of our law. I assume that other States possess similar legislation, and that where a tax is imposed on the sale of an article or commodity that purchases made by the Federal Government are exempt. If the Federal Government can tax purchases made by other governmental agencies, then the several States can reciprocate and tax similar purchases made by the Federal Government of articles taxed within a State and purchased therein. It will result in the starting of a vicious circle of one sovereign body taxing the other, an unwise and unnecessary situation to have under our dual system of government. There is a great principle involved in my bill which has been generally adhered to in the past and should be adhered to in the future.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. It has always been the policy of Congress, has it not, in enacting a revenue bill to provide just such an exemption as the gentleman suggests here?

Mr. McCORMACK. Exactly; but it was overlooked in the situation that developed in the consideration of the bill.

My resolution provides an amendment which reads as follows:

That section 621–A of the revenue act of 1932 is amended by adding at the end thereof a new paragraph, as follows:

"3. To a State or political subdivision thereof in the amount of any tax under this title which has been paid with respect to the sale of any article purchased by it for use solely in the exercise of an essential governmental function."

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one additional minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. That confines the nonpayment of a tax to those purchases which relate to an essentially governmental function; purchases made by elected officials of the State, municipality, town, or county.

Suppose you are a wholesaler in New York, in San Francisco, or in any town. With the knowledge that the purchases made from the manufacturer are exempt from taxation you are competing with the manufacturer under conditions which are discriminatory, because the State, city, town, or county, knowing that their purchases from the manufacturer will be exempt naturally will not be inclined to make purchases from a wholesaler. Therefore, not only is it unfair to impose these taxes upon the taxpayers of local government but it is unfair to business men, the wholesalers, the jobbers, the local business man who hires local help and pays taxes to the local government, because it unconsciously discriminates against them. [Applause.]

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the committee rises.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. RAINEY] having resumed the chair, Mr. WEST, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12360) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to enter into a contract to purchase the parcel of land and the building known as the Grand Central Station Post Office and Office Building, No. 452 Lexington Avenue, in the city, county, and State of New York, for post office and other governmental purposes, and to pay the purchase price therefor on or prior to June 30, 1937, pursuant to House Resolution 257, he reported the same back to the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule the previous question is ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LANHAM, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

AMENDMENT OF THE SIXTH EXCEPTION IN SECTION 3 OF THE IMMIGRATION ACT OF 1924

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 236, for the consideration of H. R. 8766, a bill to amend the sixth exception in section 3 of the immigration act of 1924 with reference to nonimmigrant status of certain aliens.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York calls up a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 236

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 8766, a bill to amend the sixth exception in section 3 of the immigration act of 1924 with reference to nonimmigrant status of certain aliens.

That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 30 minutes, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and any amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, this is a rule to consider an immigration bill. The Rules Committee was informed that this bill was requested by the State Department and that there was no opposition to it from any source that was then known.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8766) to amend the sixth exception in section 3 of the immigration act of 1924 with reference to nonimmigrant status of certain aliens.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 8766, with Mr. WEST in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Chairman, this is a simple bill. Prior to the immigration act of 1924 those countries with which we had treaties, commerce treaties and treaties on navigation, were allowed to send into this country to transact business under those treaties aliens from those countries who came with a nonimmigrant status, that is to say, they came here and transacted the business under those treaties. They were allowed to bring their families with them, and after transacting the business they returned to the countries from which they came.

The immigration act of 1924 limited that right to all those treaties which existed at that time. There were about 30 treaties which this Nation had with other nations at that time with respect to commerce and with respect to navigation. This bill simply extends that right to treaties which have been made since then or are in prospect of making.

As has been stated by the Chairman of the Rules Committee this bill has the sanction, as the committee understands it, of the State Department and that department requests its passage. There are pending in this country several treaties, treaties with Germany, Austria, and several other countries, and those countries are asking the right which we extended under the treaties that existed in 1924. That right, as I have stated, allowed those countries to send aliens to this country to transact the business incidental to those treaties which were then in force between those countries and the United States.

That is all of the bill, as I understand it. As I have said, it is a simple bill, and I trust the House will ratify the action of the committee.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KERR. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. GOSS. I notice that line 9 states—and his wife, and his unmarried children under 21 years of age.

But I also notice in the report on page 2, of section 3, that the term "child" only applies to his own children or those whose adoption took place prior to January 1, 1924. It seems to me that if the child were legitimately adopted even after that time it might be considered as one of his own children.

Mr. KERR. That is true, but by this bill we simply give the alien the right to come here and bring his family.

Mr. GOSS. What is the intent of the committee when it refers to the fact that the term "child" does not include a child by adoption unless the adoption took place before January 1, 1924? It seems to me, as I have said before, even if the adoption took place after that time the child should be considered as one of his own children.

Mr. KERR. I should think that this refers to natural children or those who become lawful children by adoption prior to January 1, 1924.

Mr. GOSS. But I am calling the gentleman's attention to the fact that the report states that the term "child" does not include a child by adoption unless the adoption took place before January 1, 1924.

Mr. KERR. There may be some ambiguity about that.

Mr. GOSS. I should hope that in the passage of this bill it would not exclude a child legally adopted even after that date.

Mr. JENKINS. If the gentleman will permit, I might explain that this language is the exact language employed in the immigration law when it refers to wives and children. It says wife and children under 21 years of age. It brings that language up to the present time, and it is intended to take care of those who come here to transact business under the treaties to which the gentleman from North Carolina has referred. It is exactly the same language as appears in the immigration law.

Mr. GOSS. The gentleman heard what I read from the report of the committee. In the gentleman's opinion, would it allow a child to come here who had been legally adopted after January 1, 1924?

Mr. JENKINS. I think so.

Mr. GOSS. That is my point. I want to know the intent of Congress on that, and I think that should be made clear. It seems to me a pity to penalize a man in coming here because he has such an adopted child.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If the gentleman will permit an interruption, he will find the present law in roman type at the top of page 3 of the report.

Mr. GOSS. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS] has stated, the language "his wife, and his unmarried children under 21 years of age" is carried forward from another paragraph of the 1924 act, and I am inclined to think it would not apply to stepchildren. However, I think the best plan, inasmuch as this bill is at the suggestion of the State Department and is a perfecting bill, would be to let us pass the bill to-day on the assurance of the members of the committee, including the Representative from North Carolina in charge of the bill, that we will make an inquiry of the State Department and, if an amendment is desirable and does not disturb other paragraphs of the law, we will try to have it made.

Mr. GOSS. My only point is that we are trying to make it easier for these men to come here and trade, and it seems to me it would be a pity to exclude one of these men if he has a child adopted after 1924. I hope the gentleman will look into this and get the intention of Congress clear, because it would be my idea in voting for this bill that I would allow such a child to come in even though it was adopted after 1924.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. We have been trying for several years to pass a bill with an amendment to define merchants. We have had such a bill on the calendar, but it could not be reached on account of abandoning Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. GOSS. I am not opposing the bill, but I want to get the intention of Congress; and do I understand that the intention of the committee would be to allow a man to come in with his wife and children under 21 years of age, and that this would include an adopted child adopted after January, 1924? There is not anything in the bill that bothers me, but I am not sure about the language in the report accompanying the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In the law there is a definition of the word "child," and an adopted child is not considered a child for the purposes of immigration.

Mr. GOSS. This man is not an immigrant. He is one who is coming here to do business and then is going back, and it seems to me a pity to break up a family on account of a little technicality of this sort.

Mr. JENKINS. If the gentleman will permit, I believe I was wrong in my statement a while ago. This bill does not take care of a man who comes in here to do business, but the man who comes here to transact the business and to stay here more or less permanently, and the object of this is to prevent these people coming in here as merchants from bringing in anybody that is not a legitimate child.

Mr. GOSS. My point refers to a legally adopted child, but one adopted after 1924.

Mr. JENKINS. I think the significance of the date in 1924 is due to the fact that there are certain treaties that have been enacted before that time that are causing us a great deal of trouble. The court has interpreted them one way and the department has sought to interpret them in another way, and they have fixed upon this as an arbitrary date. I do not think anything unfortunate is going to happen from this language at all.

Mr. GOSS. I notice from the report, which has to do with the intention of Congress, that this is one of the reasons we are passing the bill, and I am hopeful it will be sufficiently broad to allow to come in a legally adopted child adopted after 1924.

Mr. KERR. Let me say to the gentleman who has made inquiry of several Members that it seems to me this language includes the very thing the gentleman has in mind and takes in the whole family. The language of the bill is "his unmarried children under 21 years of age, if accompanying or following to join him."

Mr. GOSS. True; but I am referring to the report accompanying the bill.

Mr. KERR. The report is no part of the law.

Mr. GOSS. I understand; but would not that show the intent of Congress?

Mr. KERR. I think the bill is clear with this language.

Mr. GOSS. Would the gentleman be willing to accept an amendment to the bill "including legally adopted children"?

Mr. KERR. It is entirely agreeable to me to do that, but I think the bill itself now covers all the members of the family who come within the purview of the bill.

Mr. GOSS. Under the 5-minute rule I should like to offer such an amendment unless the gentleman would care to offer the amendment to clarify the act.

Mr. KERR. That would be satisfactory to me.

Mr. SWICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KERR. Yes.

Mr. SWICK. For what length of time are these traders or merchants allowed to remain here?

Mr. KERR. There is no time fixed by the statute, but it is contemplated they should stay here as long as the subject matter involved in the treaty is under consideration.

Mr. SWICK. And there is no time limit?

Mr. KERR. There is no time limit.

Mr. HARE. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SWICK] anticipated my question as to whether or not there is any provision as to the time these people will be permitted to remain in the United States after the business is transacted.

Mr. KERR. Not in this bill; and as I said to my friend from Pennsylvania, it is contemplated they should stay here under this law as long as they are engaged in the transaction of business incident to the treaties.

Mr. HARE. May I ask just one more question? Is there any provision of law or any obligation on anyone to see that they do return after the business is transacted?

Mr. KERR. My answer to that would be that I think the general immigration law takes care of that and that those who are not naturalized would have to be deported.

Mr. SWICK. Who will determine when these immigrants or these traders will have to return to their own country?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. This is a perfecting bill made necessary by Supreme Court decisions. In the 1924 immigration restriction act we did not make a definition of merchants so as to mean merchants engaged in international business.

Mr. HARE. One more question. Admitting all legally adopted children, the question arises whether or not it may not lead to the adoption of undesirable children, bringing them to this country, and no provision made for their return.

Mr. KERR. Any attempt to commit a fraud on the law, of course, would be a violation which is punishable.

Mr. HARE. Not if it is legalized by this amendment.

Mr. KERR. Of course, this bill only refers to bona fide families and bona fide adopted children.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself five minutes. I want to clarify the purpose of this bill. First, as to the admission of merchants. When the 1924 immigration restriction act was in the process of being written, it was necessary to make provision for those entitled to come to the United States under the treaties made by the United States with other countries. Merchants are entitled under the treaties to come here.

Mr. JENKINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. JENKINS. As I understand, we only have treaties with a very few countries that this would apply to. The great bulk of them come here under other provisions.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In the general provisions of treaties are clauses to the effect that nationals of one country may travel in the other country without hindrance. That is advisable for the general intercourse of business. It is also provided that those who come for the purpose of international business may stay indefinitely, but they do not become citizens.

In making the 1924 act, an effort was made to define international merchants, and your then Committee on Immigration received a letter from the Department of State that the text as we had it never would apply to a merchant transferring his business and his residence from the treaty country to the United States. But after the act became a law, it was found that the treaty with China permitted that very thing. You will find a decision by the Supreme Court where it was decided that under our treaty merchants could come to the United States to be merchants in this country. We are now curing that.

On the other hand, if a man is coming, say, from South America, not to be a permanent resident but to stay for a certain length of time, to sell burlap, under the treaty he has a right to do so, but he does not become a citizen. And suppose some one in the United States goes to London to be, say, correspondent for the New York Times. Under the treaty, he can go and stay by the year.

Now, in order to bring the China situation on a parity with other countries, this bill has been introduced to correct the immigration act of 1924—first, so that other countries without treaties with the United States can now make treaties identical with those made by the other major countries prior to 1924, and, secondly, we correct the "merchant" situation.

The bill does not add to the immigration of the United States. It really restricts, because it puts the orientals who come here under their treaty as merchants in the attitude of international merchants, so that if they come hereafter, they will have to come under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I yield.

Mr. PARSONS. All it does is simply to eliminate the words the gentleman refers to?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It eliminates the words "present existing" and it brings the wife and child, if they come with the treaty merchant or immediately follow but the merchant must come on international business and can only remain if he maintains that status.

One thing more. I call attention to the proviso on page 2:

Provided, That no greater rights of entry are hereby conferred upon aliens entering the United States under a treaty of commerce and navigation to be concluded in the future than are conferred under treaties which have been concluded since July 1, 1924.

That proviso indicates the intention of the Congress that when treaty-making powers make treaties, they shall treat the question of immigration as a domestic matter and recognize the right of a sovereign nation to handle its own immigration problems.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McSWAIN].

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McSWAIN. I do this for the purpose of announcing the presence in our galleries of some very distinguished guests. These young ladies and young gentlemen in the galleries are the future farmers and farmerettes of America, the young ladies and young men of the 4-H club. I think they typify in a large measure the hope of this country. We are very glad to have them as our guests. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, the Rules Committee is granting rules one after another for immigration bills and general bills, but they have failed to give us opportunity to consider the Moore bill.

Mr. DIES. Does the gentleman know what became of that Moore bill that we had before the Rules Committee a month or more ago?

Mr. GREEN. I appreciate the gentleman's interest. We appeared before the Committee on Rules. Nearly all of the members of the Immigration Committee were there, and apparently nearly all of them were in favor of the immediate passage of the Moore bill to restrict immigration by 90 per cent.

Bills liberalizing and weakening our immigration laws have obtained consideration, and yet we do not have a rule for the consideration of the Moore bill. I think the Rules Committee should at once give us a rule and permit us to pass the Moore bill, the substance of which passed the House a year ago. The bill has been introduced and has been favorably reported by the Committee on Immigration. I firmly believe a large majority of the Members would vote for it if they had a chance to do it. It is highly important that we further restrict immigration. We have enough creeds, and colors, and aliens in our midst now. We have some splendid American citizens of foreign birth, and some others of foreign birth who will make good American citizens, but I believe all will agree with me that at least during the present emergency immigration to the United States should be entirely stopped. I think we should stop it entirely for a period of at least five or ten years. This is not the time to weaken the immigration laws, but it is the time to enforce the ones that we have, and to pass further laws restricting immigration, because we have probably over 8,000,000 persons unemployed. Aliens, many of them, sooner or later seek employment, and it is not fair to permit aliens to enter and take positions so badly needed by American citizens. It is my desire to protect Americans and American labor. I hope the Rules Committee will give us a rule for consideration of the Moore restriction bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS].

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, I am glad that my distinguished Democratic friend from Florida [Mr. GREEN] has been moved to castigate his fellow Democrats for their shortcomings in their failure to support a program of restriction of immigration. Of course, the country knows that the Republicans have always been recognized as the champions of the policy of keeping America for Americans. The Republicans wrote the quota law of 1924. The Democrats have had control of the House of Representatives during this session and have failed to enact any restrictive legislation of any kind. My friend Mr. GREEN is entirely right in his criticism. In my own time I wish to ask him upon whom does he place the responsibility for the failure to pass any immigration legislation during this session of Congress.

Mr. GREEN. I feel that the Rules Committee should give us a rule.

Mr. JENKINS. I am glad that the gentleman has answered the question. The Rules Committee is the most powerful committee of the House, with reference to determining what legislation might be considered and what might not be considered. This committee is under Democratic control. Here we are, coming to the close of the session, considering now a bill of practically no consequence, when we should be considering something of some consequence. The Rules Committee gives us a special rule for this bill, but refuses to give us a rule for consideration of the Jenkins-Moore bill, which would cut down all immigration by 90 per cent and which would put the whole world on a quota. This bill does not mean much one way or the other, but we are all going to favor it. We on the Republican side are willing to favor it. We had before our committee this year the Jenkins-Moore bill and we voted it out. This is a very important restrictive immigration bill. It is the same bill in effect as the Jenkins bill that was passed by the House last year by an overwhelming vote, and would have passed the Senate except for a filibuster directed by Senator THOMAS against other proposed legislation. Had it come to a vote, it would have passed the Senate also by a large vote. The country demands this bill. The Democratic leadership has not shown any disposition to heed the demands of the people. Every patriotic organization in the country demanded its passage. In this group are the American Legion, the Daughters of the American Revolution, the Junior Order, and about 84 others. It may be that the responsibility rests with the Democratic Speaker, for he has never been strong for restrictive immigration. In fact, he appeared before the Committee on Immigration a few years ago in opposition to the restriction of immigration from Mexico. We have importuned the Rules Committee on numerous occasions for a rule for the Jenkins-Moore bill, but to no avail. Let them be held responsible. It has been claimed that the President of the United States has issued restriction regulations which are too rigid and that he has given instruction to consuls to enforce the liable-to-become-a-public-charge clause of the law to such an extent that it has become obnoxious. I do not admit that these accusations are well founded as to the President causing an abuse of the rights of anyone, but it is true that the President issued rather strict orders, but the President has had to do that.

Because of our failure to pass restrictive immigration laws, the President has been forced to restrict immigration by official edict. This should not be done; the President does not wish to do it; and in his message delivered at the opening of the present session of Congress he specifically requests relief in that direction. We are restricting immigration into this country by order of the President of the United States because of the impotency of those in power in this Congress to permit us to have a real restriction bill. The Congress should legislate and not sit back and compel the President to make up for their shortcomings. My good friend Mr. MOORE on the Democratic side has introduced a bill in this session of Congress which is exactly the same as the Jenkins bill previously introduced, and practically the same as the Jenkins bill passed by the House in the last session of Congress. While there is no chance for the consideration of this bill in this session of Congress, it is the hope of all restrictionists that it may be forced to consideration at the next session of Congress. When we cut down the quotas of all European countries and place a quota on Canada, Mexico, and all the countries of the Western Hemisphere, we will have effected a good control of immigration. In this session of Congress the House has passed a bill admitting outside of quota the husbands of wives married since June 1, 1928. This bill or any other bill letting down the quota bars should not have passed. The Senate has thus far effectively stopped the passage of the bill. Likewise the bill to admit the fathers and mothers of American citizens outside the quota has not passed the House. The Dickstein bill seeking to do this was passed by the House, but not until after it had been amended by a substitution of another bill of which I was the author and which amendment creates additional preference within the quotas for fathers and mothers but keeps them within the quota. In this way the fathers and mothers from all countries will come first, and will be given first preference within the quotas, but they will not be admitted outside the quotas. It is right and proper to adjust the preferences within the quota so that the fathers and mothers and husbands should be given preference, but it is not proper for these to be put outside of the quota, thereby opening large holes in the quotas through which many additional aliens will be permitted to come.

Now, addressing myself immediately to the subject before us, as I said before, we Republicans favor the passage of this bill. It does not mean much of anything, but it does no serious harm. I hope everybody will vote for it so that we can accomplish the passage of at least one immigration bill during this session of Congress. The passage of this bill is desired by the State Department, for it will assist them in administering the law. There seem to have been some court decisions that affect the admission of treaty merchants. This bill will confine the activities of these immigrant merchants to "trade between the United States and the foreign State from which they come." It will prevent them carrying on trade promiscuously with other countries. Also, it will relieve the department from being bound under treaties that were existing on or before 1924, but will permit a change of the regulations in accordance with subsequent treaties as they may be entered into. The State Department recommends the passage of this bill, and I for one wish to assist the State Department when I can without letting down the bars to additional immigrants when we have now a great problem to handle our large number of deserving unemployed.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no further debate the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 3 (6) of the immigration act of 1924 be amended so as to read as follows:

"(6) An alien entitled to enter the United States solely to carry on trade between the United States and the foreign State from which he comes under and in pursuance of the provisions of a treaty of commerce and navigation, and his wife, and his unmarried children under 21 years of age, if accompanying or following to join him: Provided, That no greater rights of entry are hereby conferred upon aliens entering the United States under a treaty of commerce and navigation to be concluded in the future than are conferred under treaties which have been concluded since July 1, 1924."

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which is at the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. Goss: Page 1, line 9, after the word "children," insert "including legally adopted children."

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I will not take much time, because this was discussed a moment ago in debate with the chairman of the committee. I have talked with some of the members of the committee. I refer to page 3 of the report to the words "present existing" in brackets. The members feel that "legally adopted children" will be included in that. Therefore, if that is the case, I am offering it so that the intent of Congress will not be misunderstood in the future.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

I am sorry I can not be any too sure about this. The handling of treaties is a matter for the Committee on Foreign Relations. In previous Congresses members of that committee have been consulted whenever immigration laws require mention or reference to treaties. If I read this correctly, in an effort to clarify, we have moved up the words of another paragraph, namely, "wife and unmarried children, under 21 years of age," and put them in with those persons we are proposing to admit under treaty relations. The real purpose is to permit the making of some treaties since 1924, and I think it is far better to vote down this amendment with reference to adopted children, because I know that efforts have been made on every hand to include adopted children in the nonquota classes of people coming as immigrants. So I am afraid to ask you to vote for this amendment. If it can be properly put in, I will personally undertake to see that it is taken care of in the Senate. Remember, there are merchants and merchants; and if too many come, it is hard to keep track of them.

Mr. GREEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I yield.

Mr. GREEN. Suppose somebody adopted a Chinese child, why could he not bring him in under that amendment? I am opposed to it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I can not keep up with all the provisions of the Chinese exclusion act, the treaty with China, and the regulations. That is where we are having some trouble.

Mr. JENKINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I yield.

Mr. JENKINS. It would also be difficult to tell what would be a legal adoption in another country. The adoption proceedings would have to be legal or illegal, according to the law of another country.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. GOSS. What is meant by section 2, on page 3 of the report, by this language, "under the definitions referred to the term 'wife' does not include a wife by reason of a proxy or picture marriage"—of course, I can understand that—"and the term 'child' does not include a child by adoption unless the adoption took place before January 1, 1924"?

What was that except a legal adoption?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That is the definition of "child," in paragraph 28, devoted to definitions in the 1924 act, and it does not include a child adopted after 1924.

Mr. GOSS. But it is possible prior to 1924. All I am trying to do is to extend it a little later in order not to separate families.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In 1924 we were passing an immigration act and excluding certain people, and we acted to prevent the adoption of children for immigration purposes. We do not propose now to open the gates for immigration. If we did not have any trouble with regard to oriental countries and treaties and court decisions, the proposal might do; but I think it would be better to vote the amendment down at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. Goss].

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the committee automatically rises.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. RAINEY] having resumed the chair, Mr. WEST, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8766) to amend the sixth exception in section 3 of the immigration act of 1924, and, pursuant to House Resolution 236, he reported the bill back to the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule the previous question is ordered on the bill to final passage.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. KERR, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—THE LEGISLATIVE BRAIN

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, Senators COPELAND, FRAZIER, JONES, and NYE, during the past month or so, have had published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a series of articles on brain measurements, and the deductions therefrom, on legislative ability.

The writer of these articles is Dr. Arthur MacDonald, formerly "fellow" of Johns Hopkins University, and a distinguished anthropologist, who has written a number of works on that and other allied subjects.

The learned doctor, who is a familiar figure around the Capitol, where he has been making his researches for many years, gives the palm to the Senate for size of brain and, inferentially, legislative ability. His conclusions have provoked more or less amusing controversy in the press and, perhaps, a little resentment and criticism among the Members of the lower House. Sensitiveness on the subject is hardly justified, however, as some of the most distinguished men in history have not been conspicuous for the mere size of their craniums.

A further explanation of Doctor MacDonald's findings is that the men with big heads were the first to accept the doctor's invitation to submit to his examinations. Who ever saw a man wearing a 7¼ hat and upwards who was not fond of slipping it over the head and ears of his usually more bashful friends who could boast of nothing larger than a 6⅞? Let the small heads take heart. The learned doctor uses other tests and data besides mere circumference. There are height about the ears and width and length to be taken into consideration as well.

Another explanation is that so few of the House Members have lent themselves to this experiment. Before any final conclusions can be drawn the full membership of both Houses should be measured. The Members of the House owe a duty to themselves and to their side of the Federal Legislature to jump into the breach and try to raise the House average.

I have spoken to some of our Members, both those with the small heads and those with the big heads, and found them somewhat suspicious that the tests might unduly penetrate the sanctity of their personal peculiarities. Doctor MacDonald assures me there is no ground for this fear, and hands me the following list of the questions—all confidential—which bear on his tests:

FOREIGN LEGISLATURES

The doctor also plans an extension of his researches so as to include the legislative bodies of all foreign nations. He is sending a circular letter to the officials of their respective parliaments urging their cooperation, as well as to foreign anthropologists and physicians to arouse their interest in this vast scientific study.

AMERICAN CONGRESS SHOULD COOPERATE

It is a well-known fact that foreign parliaments have a larger percentage of doctors and scientific men than is to be found in either the Federal Congress or in our State legislatures, and it is probable that they will show results which will outdistance us. I would, therefore, urge my colleagues to extend to the learned doctor their hearty cooperation.

Doctor MacDonald informs me that he will be glad to make appointments at the convenience of Members if communicated with at his address, No. 314 East Capitol Street.

Twenty-four specialists in the faculty of Johns Hopkins University have consented to examine gratis every Member of Congress who takes the physical anthropological measurements of Doctor MacDonald.

The medical examinations are supplementary to Doctor MacDonald's measurements, and may prove of value in discovering latent physical weaknesses or defects.

Incipient tendencies, not yet noticed, if discovered early by the specialist, usually can be remedied, but if undetected they may become serious, if not fatal. Each specialist makes a full report to Doctor MacDonald, and the Member examined can have a copy.

The one fundamental idea is to keep well, and every hour spent in these examinations may add many years to the Member's life and also spare him from much pain, suffering, and sickness, enabling him to be more efficient in his public service.

The problem is to have the normal decadence of life extended equally to all the vital organs, for the chain is never stronger than its weakest link.

EXAMINATION OF NATIONAL BANKS

Mr. HOGG of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the question of examination of national banks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. HOGG of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, since my remarks in the House on May 26, 1932, with reference to the examination of national banks, I have received a number of letters from various sections of the country with reference to the status of banks once closed but subsequently reopened by permission of the Comptroller of the Currency. I unhesitatingly say that when such an institution has reopened after being once closed, this fact is the strongest possible indorsement of strength. At this point I want to call attention that I am proud of the fact that none of the national banks in my district were closed by an order of the Comptroller of the Currency. Our banks were solvent. The hysteria prevalent in other communities spread into our section, causing unprecedented runs on all of these institutions. Rather than permit these runs to absorb all of the liquid assets of the institutions, the officers and directors very properly closed the doors and took the position that there should be no preferences.

But the point I wish to emphasize is that these men connected with these institutions did not surrender. When they closed their own banks to protect all depositors, then, of course, it was necessary for the Comptroller of the Currency to take charge. One of these institutions, the First National Bank of Ripley, located in a fertile agricultural section, was among the oldest in the State. Its president, officers, and directors were among the outstanding and most respected men in the community and these people did not permit their faith and confidence in these men to be shattered, and through this confidence and faith I am proud to say this bank has reopened.

Like the burden which the German armies imposed upon the French in the war of 1870, no one thought that the stockholders and officers of this bank would be able to fulfill the conditions imposed by the Comptroller of the Currency in order to reopen. He demanded that thousands of dollars of new money be advanced by these men personally, representing most burdensome exactions. But they met them!

It is a peculiar thing in connection with our system of examination of national banks that there are only two occasions upon which the examiners certify as to the soundness of an institution: One is when the charter is originally issued; the other is as to a reopened bank. A bank which has once closed its doors, whether voluntarily or not, can not reopen without authority from the comptroller. Permission to reopen is equivalent to the highest sort of recommendation of solvency. I cite this instance in connection with much of the discussion which has taken place on the floor of the House with reference to the solution of banking difficulties. I am confident that, with the same determination, backed by the same community confidence that exists in Ripley, many of the institutions which are now closed could again be rehabilitated.

REMEDY FOR UNEMPLOYMENT AND LOW PRICES

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech I delivered over the radio to-day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a radio address by myself during the National Grange hour from WRC.

We are now in the third year of the economic depression which set in after the crash in the stock market in the fall of 1929, and it must be apparent to every thinking person that the perplexing problems with which we are confronted will not solve themselves.

Day after day we have been told by business, financial, and political leaders that fear, otherwise loss of confidence, is the basic and almost the whole cause of the continued depression. Fear of what? Loss of confidence in what?

What have the people lost confidence in? Mostly in their ability to hold their present jobs or to get another one if they lose the one they have; or, having had no job in a long time, that they will never have another; or, as is the case with the farmers who now have to sell their products far below the cost of production, that prices on the things they have to sell will never rise to a profitable level.

It may be fairly assumed that we have a condition in this country which equals one worker in every four being without income or purchasing power, which would mean, roughly, that 25 per cent of those who are gainfully employed in normal times are now without work or income.

It must be evident that since at least 93 per cent of our market is within our own country, and the percentage is higher under prevailing conditions, and since more than 80 per cent of our entire population, the great body of consumers, is made up of the gainfully employed and their dependents, that our chief reliance in getting our country back on the road to recovery must be not abroad in foreign markets but at home in our domestic market. Our first concern should be the restoration of that 25 or 30 per cent purchasing power, which means at least that much consuming power at home. How may that be done?

But one possible way is open. That is to get the unemployed back to work. And there is but one economically sound way of restoring these unemployed sufferers to employment, and that is by dividing up the available amount of work.

That means either fewer days a week or fewer hours a day, or both. The fact is that to completely take up the slack that has accumulated and stop the depression immediately it would be necessary to go to a 5-day week with a 6-hour day. Now, what would that mean?

It would mean no reduction in the hourly wage rate; in fact, wages could and should be put back to the 1929 level. But it would mean that each worker now employed would work one-fourth less time and would receive one-fourth less income than he did in 1929 until more prosperous conditions returned. It would mean that men now unemployed would have jobs. It would mean that the purchasing power of all our people—at least to the point where the necessities of life could be had—would be restored. It would mean that the wheels of our factories would necessarily begin to turn to supply the demands of this restored consuming class, bringing about further employment. It would mean a much desired increase in the price of commodities, especially farm products. In short, it would mean a return to better wages and a short cut to normal prosperity.

Now, how would this work out in practice? It simply would mean that there would be a 25 per cent increase in the collective purchasing power of the people and that the necessities of life would be placed within the reach of every man who is willing and able to work. It is pertinent to say in this connection that the gainfully employed, according to published statistics, contribute 87 per cent of all charitable funds, so that the worker who is now employed is having to give up some of his income to keep his brother worker in idleness on a starvation basis, all of which is unsound, both economically and sociologically.

The wage earner would naturally object to and resent having to take a 25 per cent reduction in his gross income for the good of his country unless wealth made an equal sacrifice, and he should resent any such unfair proposal. Therefore he would have to be assured that wealth would make its sacrifice, too, and the faith would have to be kept. Congress has just provided for that through drastic increases in the income and estate taxes. The plan which I am proposing is not only based upon sound economics but it also commends itself from the humanitarian standpoint.

We are face to face with the most serious situation in the history of this country. We must act now. The greatest burden has not yet fallen upon the charitable organizations. Millions who have not been heard of in this depression are moving toward the bread lines. Why? Because, as the depression continues, the savings of the thrifty are being consumed in supporting not only themselves but their unemployed relatives. Those savings are rapidly becoming exhausted, and that means that usually not one family but two or three families are thrown upon the public charge as each savings account is exhausted.

In many of our cities the funds which were so generously contributed for the relief of the unemployed have practically all been expended. Since most of our cities have already gone into debt to the limit of their legal capacity in providing all sorts of improvements, they are, generally speaking, not in a position to further mortgage their credit to take care of the unemployed. The constitutions of some of our greatest States provide that there shall be no State debt, or set definite limits amounting to a few million dollars regarding State debts when authorized.

This shows how serious the situation is confronting the unemployed as the funds which have been voluntarily contributed are nearing the point of exhaustion. According to press despatches, relief funds in the third largest city in the country will last only one more week, and unless other arrangements can be made during the interval, 50,000 families in that community will be without the means of subsistence. In one community in the Middle West having a population of less than 300,000, 60,000 people are in the bread line and are being fed at an average cost of 9 cents per day. Indeed, there is one charity in New York City which is furnishing meals at a cost of 1 cent each. Keeping in mind the fact that the conditions alluded to are nation-wide in their ramifications, it is easy to understand why farm products are selling at the lowest price in 35 years. Before the price of farm commodities can be restored to normal levels, we must restore the purchasing power of that portion of the population which is now unemployed, and which includes about one-fourth of all the wage earners in the country.

I am persuaded that the real solution of the problem which I am discussing does not consist in settling or colonizing on a wholesale scale in the rural districts the unemployed industrial workers of our cities and towns. It must be remembered that this army of unemployed workers with their dependents is at least two-thirds as large as the entire farm population of the United States.

It must also be remembered that agriculture has been seriously depressed for a period of more than 10 years and that those who are now upon the land and are thoroughly familiar with every phase of their calling are gradually being reduced to insolvency and bankruptcy. Overproduction of farm products is one of the controlling causes of this condition. It is recognized by every economist of note in the country that a successful and prosperous agriculture is the foundation upon which any substantial and continuous prosperity must rest. It is obvious that insolvency and bankruptcy on the farm can not be halted by putting other millions on the land, thereby causing a still further overproduction of farm products for which no market can be found. The true solution of the question lies in putting the unemployed back to work in the industries where they were formerly employed.

The effects of the depression become more rapidly and progressively cumulative. It is like a snowball started rolling down a mountain—the more snow it gathers the bigger it becomes; the bigger it becomes the more snow it gathers.

The emergency measures which have been adopted at the suggestion of President Hoover have all been beneficial in their way as temporary expedients. They have, in my opinion, prevented the collapse of our entire financial and business structure. But they are not enough, as they do not go to the root of the trouble. They treat the symptoms but not the cause of the disease.

Regardless of how much wealth one man may have, he can consume only so much food, wear only so much clothes, use only so many automobiles, employ only so many doctors, have only so much laundry work done. And it must be obvious that one man having all the wealth could not consume as much, waste as he would, as would 122,000,000 people with the wealth distributed among them. Money is not the only limit of consuming capacity. So we must inject new life into the foundation; and when that is done, demand will turn the wheels of industry, labor in factory and on farm will be profitably employed, money will again find investment at profitable rates and we will spiral upward. If we do not do this and we continue to spiral downward, no man can now foretell the extent of the evil results which may ensue.

The thing taking place in this country and the world is complete economic readjustment made necessary by the development of labor-displacing machinery and mass production. An exhaustive study of statistics and conditions will convince the most skeptical that a proper readjustment can come only from a frank acknowledgement of the situation, and a prompt division of available employment to the point where all who will may earn at least the necessities and comforts of life for themselves and their dependents. It is only in this way that the consuming power of the American people can be kept at a point where industry and finance can be profitably and continuously employed. All statistics show conclusively that benefits to labor and to agriculture have not kept pace with those to industry and finance, and until this condition is corrected no lasting benefits can accrue to any one of them.

To the thoughtful person this indicates that we are confronted with the selection of one of two roads we must follow in the future. We must either so arrange our affairs that there will be a limited amount of employment for all at fair and equitable wages or we must go down the years with an ever-increasing number of those constantly unemployed, for whom the balance of us must provide the necessities of life.

The specific benefit of this plan to agriculture is manifold. The farmer's market is not among other farmers. It is among the nonagricultural classes, most of whom are the factory workers, the white-collar workers, and other gainfully employed persons of the towns and cities, who do not produce foodstuffs, but who do produce manufactured goods or service. With restoration of the consuming and purchasing power among those who normally would be gainfully employed, a demand for agricultural products which does not now exist would be revived. This, in turn, would result not only in an increased market for farm products but the demand would, under the operation of the law of supply and demand, also increase the prices for these products. This is one of the phases of this whole plan which most strongly commends itself to me, because it is now agreed by every economic authority in the United States that this country never can again be normally prosperous until agriculture has also been made prosperous.

The plan I propose is a permanent plan, to be revised and made more efficient as experience is gained. It is based upon the 5-day week, made necessary by the development of labor-displacing machinery. It can be expanded when necessary by increasing the hours of labor per day. It can be contracted by decreasing the same, leaving all our people employed at all times. It has the virtue, among others, of offering agriculture the kind of relief that agriculture has been crying for, namely, a fair market in which to sell its products, a fair price for these products, with a fair return in profits for the investment, the energy, the experience, and the labor expended.

In these days of necessary economy in government, it also has the virtue of requiring no funds from the depleted Federal Treasury. It can be put into effect without disrupting any industrial or other large business organization. It can, if the National and State Governments and employers of labor generally will cooperate to that end, be put into operation immediately, and if this is done hunger, despair, and distress will disappear from the land.

FROM THE HOME OF FRANCIS SCOTT KEY

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a speech I made on Flag Day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered by me from the Francis Scott Key Home, Georgetown, D. C., June 14, 1932:

Flag Day this year is of particular significance because we are celebrating the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of that great American who brought our flag into being.

Upon this occasion, therefore, it is appropriate that I speak from the home of Francis Scott Key, whose inspired genius garlanded the Star-Spangled Banner with sentiments of imperishable glory.

As I stand in this revered old mansion in Georgetown, Washington, D. C., now the property of the Federal Government, and which sheltered the author of our national anthem, I feel the spell of his transcendent patriotism upon me. I hear reechoing through the time-stained walls of this historic building the voice long since gone that first put into articulate form the solemn feeling of his gratitude that the flag was still there.

Before Francis Scott Key wrote his immortal lines patriot Americans were powerless to utter the deep emotions that filled them at every sight of the flag, and with every thought of the colors that stand for its red-blooded courage, the white, purity of its motives, and the blue of the heaven that has ever been our guide.

In 1812 our country was again in peril because of questions left unsettled by the Revolution and largely because our young Nation had been too busy in establishing itself to prepare adequate defenses. The result was a war with Great Britain that ran for two years against us.

The city of Washington was burned, with a loss of the Capitol, the White House, and many other public buildings. The President of the United States had been driven from the city. Our shipping had disappeared from the seas. Our humiliation was complete. The fate of the new Nation trembled in the balance. It was a question whether the independence of the United States of America would survive.

The whole issue turned on the outcome of one last battle in the autumn of 1814. The hope of the Nation lay in the city of Baltimore, and the hope of Baltimore lay in the one fort that defended it with ancient guns and an untrained garrison.

On that fateful Sunday morning in September, 1814, the alarm was sounded through the streets of Baltimore. Cannon boomed from the public square, proclaiming that the enemy ships had entered the Patapsco River and summoning the militia to guard the city.

Thus began the historic attack on Fort McHenry, in which the stout patriots had little to fire at their opponents except nails and scrap iron. We know the issue of that battle now; but while it raged, the fighting was desperate and the victory ever in doubt, ever at fever pitch.

At dusk a great storm cut short the fighting, but at dawn it broke out anew, and 15 British ships hurled bombs, rockets, and solid shot into the ramparts.

All that day and through the ensuing night the conflict continued, and every moment of it was watched by Francis Scott Key.

He had gone from his home, in which I am speaking, to Baltimore and boarded an enemy ship under a flag of truce to arrange for the exchange of a friend who had been taken prisoner. And while the battle raged he was kept on board ship, himself a virtual prisoner.

From the midst of the attacking fleet he watched the bombardment directed against his fellow Americans. Every shot that left an enemy gun was a blow at his heart. At midnight he witnessed the sending of a detachment from an enemy ship to attack the fort from the rear. Everything dear to him and to his countrymen hung on that movement and its effect on the battle. And over the battle itself hung the black pall, horror, and suspense of night.

For Francis Scott Key it was a night of anguish. What would the morning disclose? Would the fort still hold? Would the grand old emblem of red and white and blue still float defiantly from the mast of the fort in token of the survival of our country. All night long the poet paced the deck of the ship where he watched, waiting for what the morning would bring.

Then how his heart must have beat in that dramatic moment when the first blush of dawn tinged the eastern sky. With straining eyes he peered through the smoke and fog which momentarily lifted and saw—

There was the flag! The fort still held! The country was safe! In that night of anguish and suspense, in the very midst of shrieking shells and bursting bombs, and in the moment of victory was conceived our national anthem, the Star-Spangled Banner.

"O say, can you see, by the dawn's early light?" came the question from his heart.

Yes; the flag was still there! Yes; American courage had not faltered! Yes; the oppressor had failed again in a battle to lower that flag forever! Yes; the Star-Spangled Banner still waves o'er the land of the free and the home of the brave.

And in reverence to the Giver of all good, Francis Scott Key knelt upon the deck of the ship and returned thanks to Almighty God that the flag was still there.

If ever a song was born of divine inspiration, it was this song of songs. If ever a man responded to a supreme emotion, it was Francis Scott Key when he set down the words that to-day are the national anthem of our country and destined for immortality with the flag itself.

The building in which I am speaking was the home of that poet. In this beautiful old city of Georgetown, much older than the National Capital, but now a part of it, Francis Scott Key lived, here on the banks of the lovely Potomac.

All about this house there have been the mutations of progress. But I still see through these windows the Potomac much as it was in his day. On the farther side are the verdure-clad hills of Virginia, and beyond the sweeping city of our heroic dead—Arlington—while farther still are the great radio towers of the Government.

Before me rises that magnificent structure which now spans the Potomac River, named in honor of the poet, the Francis Scott Key Bridge. And almost washing the foundations of this house are the placid waters of the ancient canal which was the important method of transportation to Cumberland and the Northwest in the early days of the Capital.

Far off toward the sea wall of the city there are airplanes, electric cars, and a railway train rushing over a distant bridge. On the Potomac itself are steamers and other craft of many kinds, so that here in this sequestered spot I see the old linked with the new.

Before me is unrolled the panorama of our life as a nation, and all about I see the flag of your country and mine. Never in all these years of development has there been anything upon our soil as wonderful in its birth, as magnificent in its life as the Star-Spangled Banner itself, waving in the glory of our country's progress.

Americans everywhere thrill to the sight of its majestic folds and take comfort in the caressing shadow of its brilliant beauty.

Throughout the world it flies to-day, triumphant in its undimmed honor, nor ever lowered to an alien foe.

Within these ancient walls, now stained with the weariness of the years, this ancient masonry about me, covered with the moss of time, the solemn thoughts that enfold me here are memories—memories of the long ago, memories of our flag and all that it stands for in all the history of our beloved land.

It was on June 14, 1777, when George Washington, Commander in Chief of the Continental forces of America, ordered that flag to be made. And since that day there has been no permanent change in it, save in the canton, which has increased from 13 Colonies to 48 States.

To-day the same flag which shelters you and me would be recognized by every patriot who has shed his blood for that flag from Bunker Hill to the present moment.

To-day that flag flies from many thousands of staffs in our own and in foreign lands. It is the bright symbol of human freedom born under its folds and preserved by the millions of Americans whose devotion to it has conquered every enemy and brought victory upon every field.

I am impressed by the solemnity of this hour. I would that through this miracle of science I could bring to my listeners everywhere the feeling that inspires me as I stand in this ancient shrine, hallowed by the memories and personal associations of Francis Scott Key.

I would that we could all rededicate ourselves in devotion and in loyalty to that flag, which means so much not alone to us but to all the liberty-loving people of the earth.

I would that we could match its purity with the purity of our own lives. I would that we could match its courage with the courage of our people. I would that we could match its meaning with the beauty of the American ideal.

So long as that flag flies, so long will liberty be ours. So long as we look upon its glory, so long will we remember the blood, the tears, the courage, and the manhood that brought it into being and preserved it to us.

Through that long and troubled night it flew from Fort McHenry, and in the dawn of that day when Francis Scott Key looked over the water it was still flying, tattered and torn by the shot and turmoil of battle, but still victorious, still our own emblem, still the living symbol of our beloved land.

And as that flag has weathered every storm and survived every peril, so will it continue to lead us on in the pathway of George Washington.

As it has never been lowered in defeat, it will not trail in the dust of our own neglect.

The Ruler of all men guided those minds and hearts that set it in the sky. The God of Nations willed that it should blazen forth upon the background of heaven itself. And we, the living Americans of to-day, must feel that upon us is the trust laid down by those who looked upon this banner and died happy in the knowledge that it still waved o'er the land of the free and the home of the brave.

In the solemn stillness of this old room I seem to hear the echo of that voice speaking again to the Americans of to-day, and again asking us, his living countrymen, if the flag is still there.

Far up above the distant hills stand the ramparts of Fort Myer, and daily its guns thunder forth to the world that the flag is still there.

At the white marble tomb of the Unknown Soldier, amid the thousands of graves of patriot Americans, the whispering winds bear testimony that the flag is still there.

Down the vista of this majestic city there towers the great monument to Washington giving the answer that the flag is still there.

And beyond from the great noble dome of the Capitol itself comes the signal to all Americans that the flag is still there.

Yes, Francis Scott Key, you may sleep in peace.

We leave the shadows of this shrine, we go forth from the quiet beauty of these memories into the world of affairs, but we leave with you, in the spirit which still lingers in this old home, the answer to your question that God rules and the flag of our beloved America is still there.

COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE CAMPAIGN EXPENDITURES

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I call up a privileged resolution (H. Res. 201), from the Committee on Rules.

The Clerk read the resolution as follows:

House Resolution 201

Resolved, That a special committee of five be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives to investigate and report to the House not later than January 1, 1933, the campaign expenditures of the various presidential and vice presidential candidates and candidates for the House of Representatives in both parties, or candidates of parties other than or independent of the Democratic or Republican Parties, the names of persons, firms, associations, or corporations subscribing, the amount contributed, the methods of collections and expenditures of such sums, and all facts in relation thereto, not only as to subscriptions of money and expenditures thereof but as to the use of any other means or influences, including the promise or use of patronage, and all other facts in relation thereto that would not only be of public interest but would aid the Congress in necessary legislation or in deciding any contests which might be instituted involving the right to a seat in the House of Representatives.

The investigation hereby provided for in all the respects above enumerated shall apply to candidates and contests before primaries, conventions, and the contests and campaigns of the general election in November of 1932, or any special election held prior to December 5, 1932. Said committee is hereby authorized to act upon its own initiative and upon such information which in its judgment may be reasonable and reliable. Upon complaint being made before such committee, under oath, by any person, persons, candidates, or political committee setting forth allegations as to facts which, under this resolution, it would be the duty of said committee to investigate, said committee shall investigate such charges as fully as though it were acting upon its own motion, unless, after hearings on such complaints, the committee shall find that such allegations in said complaints are immaterial or untrue.

That said special committee or any subcommittee thereof is authorized to sit and act during the adjournment of Congress, and that said committee or any subcommittee thereof is hereby empowered to sit and act at such time and place as it may deem necessary; to require by subpœna or otherwise the attendance of witnesses, the production of books, papers, and documents; to employ stenographers at a cost of not exceeding 25 cents per 100 words. The chairman of the committee or any member thereof may administer oaths to witnesses. Subpœnas for witnesses shall be issued under the signature of the chairman of the committee or subcommittee thereof. Every person who, having been summoned as a witness by authority of said committee or any subcommittee thereof, willfully makes default, or who, having appeared, refuses to answer any question pertinent to the investigation heretofore authorized, shall be held to the penalties as prescribed by law.

Said committee is authorized to make such expenditures as it deems necessary, and such expenses thereof shall be paid on vouchers ordered by said committee and approved by the chairman thereof.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, this is similar to the resolution which has been introduced in at least two prior Congresses. I understand this is in the same words as those resolutions, setting up a House committee corresponding to a Senate committee, to look over, if necessary, expenditures in the coming election.

Mr. MICHENER. This is just a continuation of a resolution which has been passed during the last two sessions of Congress?

Mr. O'CONNOR. That is correct.

Mr. MICHENER. So that it does not function unless during the campaign complaint is made as to exorbitant expenditures of money, or something along that line, in which case the committee has authority to assemble and investigate?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Exactly.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. McFADDEN. Does the resolution provide for the committee going into primary expenditures?

Mr. O'CONNOR. No.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his motion a moment?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think the gentleman inadvertently said this resolution did not refer to primaries. The gentleman will notice on page 2, beginning in line 6, that there is an express reference to contests before primaries and conventions. So it applies not only to expenditures in the primaries but also in the conventions.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE CERTAIN POST-OFFICE MATTERS

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I call up a privileged House resolution.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, it is getting rather late in the afternoon; it is Saturday, and I think we have made pretty good progress. I have no objection to having the resolution just called up, but I do not think we should take action upon it this afternoon.

Mr. SABATH. This resolution will only take a few minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; but I know how sometimes a few minutes run into hours.

Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is not a quorum present.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman withhold the point of no quorum a moment?

Mr. STAFFORD. I withhold it, Mr. Speaker.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted to Mr. COYLE (at the request of Mr. DARROW) for two days on account of illness.

PROHIBITION

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Speaker, with the admission in the Hoover dry-wet-dry plank in the Republican platform that there is something wrong with prohibition (whatever the rest of the plank may mean) and with the adoption of a readable repeal plank by the Democratic convention practically assured, the tyrant of the last six Congresses is about to be dethroned.

We are rapidly approaching the last stages of the fight to free our Federal Constitution from the shackles of a criminal statute frozen almost into immutability by its erroneous injection into our basic charter. The eighteenth amendment is in its last throes.

Further argument as to the advisability of its repeal would be but repetition and would serve no useful purpose. However, for the last 12 years this country has been conducting a far-reaching experiment, noble in purpose, if you will, in economics, sociology, and jurisprudence. Our laboratory expense has been tremendous, but if the facts demonstrated are but indelibly engraved on our own consciences and correctly preserved in history for future generations, I submit that the ledger will be in balance. The results are apparent and their value almost incalculable.

In referring to the costs of our prohibition attempt, I shall not stress those payable in mere money. The doubled expense of the Department of Justice, the doubling of our Coast Guard with quadrupled cost until it alone ranks with the great navies of the world, the growth of our Customs Bureau, and the maintenance of our immense Prohibition Bureau have all added tremendously to our cost of Federal Government.

Add to this the expense borne by the States at attempted enforcement, with the tax revenue lost by Federal and State Governments and now collected by that empire of outlaws organized and prospering in our midst, and the total will rank for future generations with the pyramids of Egypt as monuments to the foolhardy capacity of man to dissipate his substance.

These are all evident costs, however, and therefore less inimical to our society than those that are unperceived.

Among these we may list the impairment of those rights dear to Anglo-Saxon civilization: The sanctity of the home, freedom from unreasonable searches and seizures; the presumption of innocence; the defense of prior jeopardy; the benefit of reasonable doubt; and the right of trial by jury. In order to enforce this law which has never received a popular support sufficient for a criminal enactment, it has been found necessary or expedient to abridge or impair many of these basic rights. One of our courts of highest standing has established the astonishing innovation that, where desirable, criminal statutes are to be liberally construed! What a heritage for a generation endowed with all the blessings of the Magna Charta, the Bill of Rights, and the Declaration of Independence to leave to its descendants!

The enforcement of this law has led to the murder of many innocent people; to the martyrdom of officers insufficiently equipped to cope with organized, highly financed crime; to unlimited blackmail; to the intimidation and debauchery of public officials; to the ruin of honorable reputations; to international enmities and complications; and to the ridicule of American idealism among the peoples of the earth.

The great majority of the officials of the evangelical churches have permitted themselves to become dupes and pawns in the hands of the fanatical zealots who have assumed to supervise the enforcement of this law. These zealots, in turn, have delivered their entire following to the support of one of our great political parties. Once again a large religious body has been prostituted to politics with the loss of precious prestige.

Mankind has cemented itself into civilized groups largely through the operation of law. We have become so used to law that when presented in ponderous volumes, it seems quite substantial. In reality, however, it is a very tenuous substance, constantly in danger of destruction by those savage animal instincts which it seeks to supplant. Its sole strength is the respect of the people. When this respect is gone, the insignificant force which law can muster is impotent, and the social fabric begins to decay. When the violation of a law becomes universally profitable, that law quickly succumbs to the stronger animal instincts of greed, avarice, and selfishness.

All of the respect we ever had for our prohibition law has been killed by universal ridicule, and the profits derived from its violation have been used to tear down and undermine our whole legal structure.

To conduct our experiment, then, we have spent unprecedented sums in enforcement; we have weakened the base of our inalienable right to liberty; we have seen a large section of our religious groups debased to political puppets; we have lost international prestige; and have weakened all the forces holding our civilization together. What has this experiment demonstrated which is to compensate us for this stupendous, if not irreparable, loss?

First. The Constitution must be confined to setting forth basic principles of government and not rules of private conduct.

Second. Criminal laws must spring from the hearts of the people and can not be imposed upon a free people by any force. People can not be reformed by law.

Third. There is no one method of control of alcoholic beverages suitable to all the divergent conditions throughout the country.

If we bear these three dearly bought lessons in mind, we will not be carried away by our enthusiasm with the repeal of the eighteenth amendment to the extent that we will recommit the errors of its enactment. We will not expect the repeal of a law to wipe out crime overnight. People are not made virtuous by law and certainly will not be sanctified by repeal. Let us remember that the home, the school, and those religious groups not engaged in politics must reassume moral and educational leadership.

For the last 12 years our people, young and old, have become accustomed to drinking strong alcoholic drinks. We can not expect them in an instant by legal fiat to return to the beverages mostly used in 1918. Our bootlegging fraternity, who for many years have measured their weekly incomes by the hundreds of dollars, will not easily settle down to a lawful trade at an insignificant income. Illicit distilling was a matter of very limited proportions in 1918. Now it has spread like a virulent infection throughout our whole society. The battle to confine this practice to backward, inaccessible regions must again be fought.

For 12 years we have seen what hypocrisy has done when associated with lawmaking. Let us eliminate it in this repeal. When, to garner votes, we talk about providing in the Constitution for the elimination of the saloon, we are voicing but hypocritical claptrap. Worse than that, we are repeating the fundamental evil of constitutional prohibition. We are putting a local law into our basic charter. We are saying to the people of New York that the people of Kansas and the Carolinas can tell them how to dispense their beverages. If prohibition has taught us anything it should be that our people of divergent localities can not be so governed.

I believe that the people of my own State, Ohio, would prefer not to consume their alcoholic beverages at the place of sale. This may not be true of a few large cities. However, if the people of Ohio are not of this mind, their selection of method of distribution cannot possibly harm or benefit any other State and ought not be subject to the control of any other State or even group of States through the Federal Government. If such control is attempted contrary to the wishes of our citizens, human nature will again assert itself, those who are indifferent will become active opponents of the law, and speakeasies will blossom in every neighborhood.

Commercial centers visited by a large transient population, and where many conventions assemble, will almost inevitably desire a different method of sale than the quiet, static, rural community. These differences are inherent, and no Federal law, Republican platform promise to eliminate the saloon, or constitutional provision will alter them.

It is because of these differences in our country—mountain and plain, coastal and inland, temperate and cold, populous and barren, alien and native, Caucasian and Ethiopian—that no universal plan of alcoholic control is possible. When our prohibition friends challenge us to produce such a plan they are on safe ground. Such a plan does not exist.

The only choice we can make is between attempted Federal control with a continuance of all the evils of the last decade and with the real prospect of the ultimate destruction of our very Government itself, or State control with Federal regulation of interstate shipments, which we already have in the Webb-Kenyon Act. This latter will not bring the millennium at once, but with proper education and moral leadership it is by far the lesser of two evils.

We may as well look at the situation as it exists and not as we wish it were or as we would like others to believe it is. If by Federal law we attempt to tell those communities where it is not desired by the people to drink in their homes, that they must not have public drinking places, we are but reopening the speakeasies. If we adopt State dispensation in communities where it is not wanted we are inviting governmental corruption. In the name of common sense, in the light of the dearly bought lessons of our tragic prohibition farce, let us abandon cant and hypocrisy, let us trust localities to handle local questions, let us stop trying to mold all people by law into the likeness of our own perfection.

PRIVATE CALENDAR

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Wednesday of next week the House consider bills on the Private Calendar.

Mr. MICHENER. Under the old rule or under the new rule?

Mr. BLACK. Under the old rule.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I am not in position to allow that agreement to go through for reasons which I have explained.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the request.

Mr. BACHMANN. Will the gentleman yield? Does the gentleman expect to have a call of the Private Calendar?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have not the floor.

Mr. BLACK. I renew my request, Mr. Speaker, in order that somebody may have the floor to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. I renew my point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will count.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the point of no quorum.

Mr. BACHMANN. Does the gentleman expect to consider bills on the Private Calendar any time during the week?

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the gentleman will yield to me for a moment, I trust arrangements may be made for consideration of bills on the Private Calendar, and it may be possible that after a conference with the chairman of the Patents Committee an arrangement may be made for dispensing with business in order on Calendar Wednesday; but in his absence, and having noticed that he probably would object to it, I do not feel justified in allowing this request to go through at this time.

Mr. Speaker, if I may be recognized for two minutes, the House has practically completed all of the resolutions from the Rules Committee, and on behalf of that committee and its chairman, who is absent, we are very grateful to the Members of the House for cooperating with us cordially in undertaking to clean up the calendar with reference to rules. The resolution which the gentleman from Illinois has called up is the last resolution that is on the calendar from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Does the gentleman mean to convey to the House that the Committee on Rules will not have any additional sessions?

Mr. BANKHEAD. No. I did not even intimate that, I may say to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

I merely desire to express the appreciation of the committee for your cooperation in assisting us to go forward as much as we have in disposing of these rules.

The business on Monday, as has been announced, will be the very controversial proposition of the conference report of the Economy Committee. I thought it proper to give notice to the Members who are interested—and I am sure they all are—that that will be the first business after the approval of the Journal on Monday.

Mr. BLACK. Has the gentleman any idea about what will be taken up on Tuesday?

Mr. BANKHEAD. No arrangement has been made as to the business on Tuesday, but I assure the gentleman from Illinois he will be given an opportunity to call up the rule against which a point of order has been made.

Mr. PARSONS. Has the gentleman any opinion as to when adjournment will be had? Has any decision been reached as to that?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman from Illinois asks me if I have any opinion as to when Congress will finally adjourn. His guess about that is as good as mine. We are all familiar with the legislative program. The House has practically completed its major program, if I may call it that, except with reference to the relief bills, conference reports on appropriation bills, and the economy conference.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Of course, the gentleman includes as part of the major program the completion of a real relief bill?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Absolutely.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I thought the gentleman had that in mind.

BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee did on June 17, 1932, present to President, for his approval, a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 10048. An act granting to the Metropolitan Water District of Southern California certain public and reserved lands of the United States in the counties of Los Angeles, Riverside, and San Bernardino, in the State of California.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the gentleman from Wisconsin has raised the point of no quorum, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, June 20, 1932, at 12 o'clock noon.

NATIONAL UNEMPLOYMENT SITUATION

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I have a telegram from Mr. Mark T. McKee, executive director American Legion national employment commission, which I ask unanimous consent to have read at the desk for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

CHICAGO, ILL., June 19, 1932.

The Hon. ROBERT F. WAGNER,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.:

During the last four months the American Legion and the American Federation of Labor, in cooperation with other organizations through the war on depression campaign, has succeeded in furnishing work for nearly 950,000 jobless, and while we will continue until the end of June to try to reach the million mark, we realize the national unemployment situation has not been bettered but is rapidly growing worse. Instead of 8,000,000 unemployed when we started our campaign, the figure is now nearer 12,000,000. The Legion posts have given their time, money, and effort unsparingly, aided by large numbers of public-spirited citizens, but we feel the limit of accomplishment has been reached, unless prompt action is taken now by the Federal Government to save the situation. The Wagner bill now pending in the Senate, with its provision for initiating a large amount of self-liquidating revenue-producing quasi-public projects, and with public-works appropriations only on such basis as the monetary conditions of the country will permit, furnishes the opportunity to again put the wheels of industry in motion and to give employment to nearly 2,000,000 jobless through its provision for the adoption of the 30-hour week. Our experience demonstrates the wisdom and absolute necessity for immediate action such as the Wagner bill provides. We must get the tide moving in the other direction or many more hundreds of thousands will be jobless. We ask no special consideration except the general welfare of all the people of the United States. We have demonstrated our good faith by attempting to secure jobs for all unemployed, not veterans alone, and we feel failure to enact such legislation now as will meet the existing desperate situation will not only destroy the effectiveness of what has been done but presages darker days for the immediate future. We urge the spirit of hope be rekindled in the breast of America's unemployed veteran and nonveteran alike by favorable action now before Congress adjourns.

MARK T. MCKEE,
Executive Director American Legion
National Employment Commission.

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, friends of Philippine independence do not desire to occupy the time of the Senate unnecessarily in a discussion of the Philippine independence bill. However, I hope the Senate will at this time pardon a brief discussion of a portion of this subject relating to the various factors for and against independence.

Mr. President, it was inevitable that when we encouraged the agricultural and industrial development of the Philippines we should at the same time increase the difficulties involved in the continuance of the islands under our control. Their possession and government, which at first were almost wholly a political problem, soon came to include economic problems of serious character. Our own agriculture and industry began to feel the effects of the development we were promoting in the Philippines. The products of the islands came to this country and competed with our own. At the same time the Philippines furnished an open market for certain American manufactures and opportunities for the investment of American capital. Those Americans who were hurt by the inflow of Philippine commodities began to seek some means of ending the competition—even if independence had to be hastened to accomplish this.

Those who were helped by their trade with the islands or by their investments there, naturally endeavored to prolong American control and government.

These private and selfish issues have greatly complicated the Philippine problem. Without criticism, express or implied, we may properly list as "selfish interests" certain groups and institutions that have their peculiar motives for advocating or opposing independence for the Filipinos. No one can justly quarrel with the representatives of such private interests for properly giving expression to their particular point of view in an honest effort to protect their rights or their welfare so far as these are involved in the fate of the Philippines.

Some of these groups and institutions are detrimental primarily because they are so thoroughly organized as to be able at times to divert public attention from the fundamental facts of our national responsibility and to center the popular mind on their particular troubles or disadvantages, thus creating confusion and indecision with respect to the main question. It is difficult, therefore, to appraise the claims of these conflicting elements, arrayed some of them for and some of them against proposals affecting the future of the islands, and to discuss the issue solely on the basis of our national promise, our national defense, and the aspirations of the Filipino people themselves. Both the advocates and the adversaries are for the most part actuated by special motives which take small account of the larger aspects of the problem.

Broadly speaking, the groups favoring independence of the islands are: (1) Three nationally organized farm organizations with State branches; (2) the Cooperative Milk Producers' Association and the National Dairy Union, nationally organized and with effective State branches; (3) the American Federation of Labor, probably the best organized of all the national factors and with efficiently managed and operated State and municipal affiliations; (4) certain fairly well organized interests in 19 beet sugar growing States and 8 cane sugar growing States; (5) an element, independent of the labor organization, favoring the exclusion of Filipinos from the United States for the same reasons that Japanese and Chinese have been excluded; (6) American investors in Cuban sugar; (7) a disorganized but somewhat assertive element in the population whose concern is that the continued free entry of Filipinos into this country may permit them to compete with our negroes in certain labor to which during many years the latter have been deemed specially adapted.

Opposing independence will be found: (1) The "Manila American"; (2) bureaucrats who fear the loss of their positions or the curtailment of our governmental activities in the islands; (3) some American manufacturers who have found in the islands a free market for their products; (4) importers of Philippine products which are not taxed under tariff laws as similar products from other countries are; and (5) Americans who have investments in the islands. It is possible, thus, to group these contending forces and also to analyze with reasonable accuracy their relative numerical and financial strength, but before I do this I shall consider the amount and the influence of American capital invested in the Philippines. The aggregate was $166,245,000 in 1930, and virtually all of it invested in the islands from 10 to 20 years ago.

For our purpose it is proper to treat the Philippines in this particular study as a foreign field, without reference to the legal interpretation of this term. And it is worthy of note that while the American investment of capital in the Philippine Islands, even under our own sovereignty, is $166,245,000, we find that the American investment in the United Kingdom is $640,892,000; in the British Empire as a whole, $5,179,945,000; in France, $471,334,000; in Germany, $1,420,957,000; in Japan, $444,639,000; in China, $175,768,000; in South America, about $3,000,000,000. In Mexico the American investment is $810,571,000.

Among the fundamental causes of American capital's lack of interest in Philippine investments are the prospect of changes in the tariff and doubts respecting the continuance of American proprietorship of the islands, both of which matters are in the hands of Congress and subject therefore to its direction. American capital, in fact, has refused to enter the Philippines on a large scale; and foreign capital, realizing that the future of the islands in the absence of a well-defined American policy is so fraught with uncertainty, is equally reluctant to assume risks there.

General Aguinaldo, who perceives and pictures the obstacle, writes:

> The present uncertainty, as I have stated, retards the economic development of the country. Capitalists have said that they do not care to make investments here in view of that uncertainty in our political status. If the uncertainty were terminated, the situation will change. Even in bolshevistic Russia, and in China with its continuous civil wars, foreign capital keeps pouring in. * * * I would prefer the opening up of world markets for our products. We have many tropical products which are in great demand, not only in the United States but also in other lands. If we could place those products in the markets of other lands besides, it would surely be to our advantage. With the possible exception of cotton and steel and machineries, we could produce the things we need locally. We do not need much for our daily living. Foodstuffs we could produce in abundance. The raw materials for the primary manufactures are here also in abundance. We could be in a position to compete in the markets of the world.
> The free-trade relations we now have with the United States were established by Congress. I do not remember that we have asked for this arrangement. It has been beneficial to the islands to be sure; but from the point of view of our national destiny it has deprived us of other markets and hence other chances.
> The result of this free-trade arrangement is as follows: Encouraged by the demand in the American market we have produced more sugar and we have also increased our production of oil and other products. But this increase is not now looked upon with favor by American agricultural interests, and we are being told to restrict our output because we are competing with American products in the United States. At the same time we are told to develop our country economically if we desire to be free. It would seem, therefore, that we are between the devil and the deep blue sea.

Let us return to the subject of the so-called "selfish interests." The three farm organizations favoring independence are the National Grange, the National Farm Bureau Federation, and the Farmers' Union. If they properly and accurately represent the opinion of the farmers of the United States, they may be said to speak for 6,297,877 Americans. But if they do not represent all the farmers, they are certainly entitled to speak for the membership of their respective organizations; that is, for 3,950,000. Furthermore, the farm value or agricultural investment represented by these American farmers is $52,747,000,000. The American investment in the agricultural industry in the Philippines, and the number of Americans engaged in farm work in the Philippines are virtually negligible. The Cooperative Milk Producers' Association and the National Dairy Union represent approximately 360,000 dairy farmers who sell $375,000,000 worth of dairy products annually. The interests of the farmer and the dairyman are essentially identical, and we may properly group these two elements together.

Closely associated with these two interests are the producers of sugar beets in the following 19 States: Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Iowa, Nebraska, North Dakota, South Dakota, Kansas, Montana, Idaho, Wyoming, Colorado, Utah, New Mexico, California, and Washington, and the producers of sugarcane in South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Arkansas, Louisiana, and Texas. The sugar industry in the United States represents an investment of hundreds of millions of dollars and furnishes employment to many thousands of American citizens.

The farmer and the dairyman see in our permanent retention of the Philippine Islands a serious menace to their interests. Already faced with the problem of overproduction, the farmers and dairymen look across the Pacific and visualize the Philippines developed to the fullness of their vast agricultural possibilities, and dread the consequences which such a development would heap on American farm and dairy products. They see cheap Philippine labor working in the fields, its products transported free of duty to the United States; and they are unable to understand why their Government should on the one hand warn them to curtail production as a means of increasing prices and, on the other hand, aid the development of Philippine agriculture through American supervision and education, and permit its products to compete with their own in the American market.

One may not in justice criticize the American farmer's foreboding at the prospect of further Philippine development and the continuance of free trade between the islands and the United States. The farm and dairy industries have not been profitable in the recent past. Struggling, as has been said, with the problem of vast acreage and overproduction, our farmers and dairymen are obliged to contribute a portion of their taxes to the building of dams and the financing of other projects for irrigating deserts and draining swamps so that larger areas of land may be devoted to agriculture, and thus to enhance the burdens which they now carry. Who shall censure them for aiding Philippine independence and the enactment of tariffs on Filipino products as two measures of protection for their own well-being?

There may be a few American farmers who contemplate with equanimity the thousands of idle farms, the numerous failures of rural banks, the fallen prices of agricultural products, and the multiplication of mortgages and the onerousness of taxes in the agrarian sections; there may be even farmers who are willing to prolong the present status of the islands without reference to their own interests, but on the whole, I think, the 6,297,877 intellectual American farmers and dairymen believe that destructive competition with the Philippines confronts them, and they are overwhelmingly in favor of divorcing the islands from American sovereignty and including them with other foreign countries against which we protect ourselves by tariffs.

Next let us consider sugar. We find that Americans have invested in Cuban sugar $544,012,000. Most of this investment is represented by stocks held throughout the United States. Selfish motives doubtless prompt these interests to seek preferential treatment in the application of American duties to their product, but it is also true that American investors in these Cuban concerns have a right to question the fairness of a policy which allows Philippine sugar to enter the United States free while it taxes Cuban sugar, which is almost as much an American commodity as it could be were it produced within our own borders.

Now comes the American Federation of Labor. This organization, representing the workers of the United States, opposed at the outset the annexation of the Philippine Islands, and in its national conventions has regularly urged independence for the islands. The Federation is at least one champion for independence whose selfish interest is tempered by devotion to the principles of freedom, self-government, and self-determination. Back in 1895 and 1896 the American Federation of Labor indorsed the struggle of the Cubans for freedom, and Samuel Gompers recommended in 1898 that it assume the same attitude toward Puerto Rico and the Philippine Islands. The recommendations of that sturdy old leader of labor were adopted and the Federation resolved against departure from our time-honored traditions and protested against "forcing our system of government upon an unwilling people." While frankly endeavoring to serve the interests of American workers by shielding them from the lower wages and inferior standards of other lands, the Federation has nevertheless steadfastly adhered to the principle that the Filipinos, if they desire freedom, have a right to be free, let the cost be what it will.

With the eyes of intelligent self-interest, however, the federation looks across the Pacific to the Philippines, where laborers work for 30 cents a day, minimum; miners for 87 cents a day; mechanics for $1.20 a day, minimum; and for a maximum wage much below that of the American worker. And the federation can find no logic to sustain the theory, either, that the products of such labor should be suffered to compete with the products of American labor, or that such low-priced labor should be permitted free entry into the United States to take the places of American workmen for hire upon which the latter could not maintain his standard of living. The American workman, therefore, represented by the American Federation of Labor, opposes the entrance of the Filipino into the United States as unfair and destructive to the American wage standard, and for the same reasons he would exclude the products of cheap Philippine labor.

The federation's fear of the evil results of the immigration of cheap Philippine labor has been realized on the Pacific coast, where already serious labor troubles have arisen from the belief that Filipinos are being imported to supplant American workmen in field and shop. No one can justly hold that the American workman, represented by the American Federation of Labor, is guilty of un-American conduct in attempting to shelter himself from the competition of cheap labor from any country whatsoever. On the contrary, this great body of workers has a right to combine pragmatism with idealism in its campaign for Philippine independence.

Another group on the side of independence are those Americans who would restrict immigration to the United States from whatever quarter. Their opposition to the free entry of Filipinos is quite consistent. They would be unfaithful to their principles if they worked to admit English, Irish, German, French, Italian, and Norwegian immigrants by quotas and yet consented that Filipinos should come here under no limitations. One may quarrel with the doctrine of these exclusionists, but granting their premises, their program in so far as it applies to the Filipinos is logical and practical. If independence for the islands will serve their purpose, they are entirely justified in favoring such course.

It is a powerful group, this. It has adherents throughout the country and has been respectfully heard by Congress on many occasions. Its efforts to exclude the Filipino were indorsed by the American Legion at its 1931 convention. The following resolution recites the Legion's views:

> Whereas the experience of California has demonstrated that Filipinos are not biologically assimilable with Caucasians in this State; intermarriage between the two races is forbidden by State law, and the presence of Filipinos in numbers has created grave economic, racial, and political problems; and
> Whereas our obligations to Filipinos as "wards of the Nation" can be best discharged, in their interests and in ours, by fitting them for permanent residence and management of affairs in their own country: Now, therefore, be it
> Resolved, That the American Legion in national convention assembled urge that entrance of Filipinos to continental United States be confined hereafter to those coming for temporary residence only as students and visitors.

Certain American manufacturers complain of unfair competition of Philippine-made commodities with American-made goods. Importations of manufactures from the Philippines are small compared with the total American production of similar articles, but our theory of government contemplates that a manufacturer who feels that his output produced under our American standard of wages and conditions is being jeopardized by the cheap labor and low costs of the Philippines is free to appeal to his Government for protection from such danger or damage, just as he is entitled to petition for governmental safeguards against destructive competition from other regions of the earth.

I have referred to all of these as "selfish factors" in the problem presented in the Philippines. I repeat that I so characterize them in no spirit of criticism. I have tried to make plain that they have a right to show their individual relationship to Philippine independence. I believe it is manifest that these interests form a powerful element and will exert a corresponding influence in the final solution of the Philippine problem. It is the duty of Congress, however, to preclude, so far as possible, any undue influence on the part of the private interests and to consider the question of independence solely in the light of actualities.

There are selfish factors in opposition to Philippine independence, and these, too, may rightly claim a hearing. But the difficulty for any student of the problem—and for Congress—will be to divide the honest opponents of independence from those whose selfish interests have little or no bearing on the future welfare of the United States or any material portion of our population. First and foremost of the opponents of independence is the active group of "Manila Americans." The second category of objectors comprises those persons or manufacturers who export their commodities to the Philippines and who desire to retain their present practical monopoly of trade with the islands, which are a market for a portion of their exportable products. Normally they are entitled to desire customers to whom they can sell American goods at American prices. The question is whether the sale of these particular goods in this monopolized market is, from a purely trade standpoint, of sufficient weight to counterpoise all of the rest of America's private interests—those of the farmer, of labor, and of the American manfacturers whose products are competed with by Philippine products.

Furthermore, there must be a satisfactory answer to the question whether, in the event of Philippine independence, any barriers shall be raised in the islands which will tend to eliminate them as a market for American products. The very opposite would seem to be the logical conclusion. The Filipino, according to a number of authorities, has learned to like American products. He probably prefers them to other products obtainable at the same cost. For 30 years he has been using them largely. He has extended his purchase of them and has made his contracts with the producers of them, and there is no ground for the assumption that merely because of independence the Filipino will debar American commodities from the Philippine markets. But should a Philippine tariff operate against the same American products in the islands, it would coincide with theories of protection entertained by most of those Americans who now sell to the islands in a free market.

American textile manufacturers, whose goods are used in the islands, are themselves among the most ardent supporters of a high tariff in the United States, to protect their domestic industry against cheap foreign products. With the exception of the automotive industry and perhaps one or two others of lesser importance, the American industries having any considerable volume of trade in the Philippine Islands, including the manufacturers of textiles, steel plants, machinery and equipment plants, and so forth, are among those who demand—and receive—protective legislation against all countries but the Philippines. Besides these, there are the American manufacturers whose products are made from raw materials imported, free of duty, from the Philippines. These manufacturers foresee in independence for the Philippines the possibility of an American tariff on the importation, or a Philippine export duty on the exportation, of these basic materials. Soaps, oils, substitutes for butter, and other commodities are in the list.

Other Philippine products, such as abacá, constitute a material portion of the islands' export trade, but these are not now affected by our tariff laws. As such products, regardless of their origin, are on our free list, there is no contention that their status would be altered by independence. They do not compete with articles grown or manufactured in the United States and therefore are not subject to our tariff provisions.

We come now to a very powerful contingent of the forces ranged against Philippine independence. It is comprised of those Americans who, having investments in the Philippines, fear that upon the withdrawal of American sovereignty their property rights or their businesses may be endangered. They deem their interests safer under American control and direction than under Philippine control and direction.

It has been pointed out that the total American investment in the Philippines, according to figures compiled by the United States Department of Commerce, is $166,245,000. Of this total, $77,000,000 is represented by Philippine bonds, including those issued by the insular, the provincial, and the municipal governments, and held in the United States. It is reasonable to suppose that Congress, in any program for withdrawal of American sovereignty, would dispose of the question of protecting the investors in such bonds, as they are strictly Philippine Government bonds.

We may deplore the motives of these groups which seek to further or to frustrate independence, and declare that bigger, broader, and more fundamental principles should decide the question of independence, but these interests can not be ignored. They are part of the problem. Their influence is more likely to grow larger than less as time drifts away. Meanwhile, the Filipino, thoroughly conversant with the motives of these two elements, is fettered by them. He feels that his political future is clouded by the conflict of interests that has continued ever since the United States acquired the islands.

Moreover, this clash of American forces has resulted in humiliation to the Filipino—as, for example, when one of them urges his exclusion from the domain of the very power which governs him and claims his allegiance. He has carried his American flag loyally. He proffered his services during the World War. He did his part in the Liberty loan drives and in other patriotic undertakings. He paid his way, and he is paying his way. And yet he finds his destiny dependent in large part on the outcome of a struggle between two great selfish groups, both alien to his native land.

Free trade between the Philippines and the United States was not initiated by the Filipinos. They opposed it because they believed and declared before it was legalized that it would create exactly the situation which confronts them to-day. They felt that trade relations with the United States on such conditions would ultimately make the Philippines a mere American market place and the people of the islands just so many customers. These presentiments have been verified.

They did not desire to develop their islands with a view to the American export market. They saw in such a policy the hazards of isolation. But free trade with the United States, rightly or wrongly, has conditioned the development of the sugar industry in the islands, and the people there have adjusted and reconciled themselves to it. If, however, they had to choose between the continuance of profitable trade with the United States and the achievement of independence, I am confident they would sacrifice the former.

They are quite willing to ratify any agreement promising a solution of the problem of sugar. One suggestion is that a definite limitation be imposed on exportation of sugar to the United States and that during the period that the Filipinos believe should be allowed to them for economic readjustment following independence, the exports be restricted to their present volume. Recalling that the United States, following our acquisition of the Philippines, accorded to Spain 10 years in which to adjust commercial and economic conditions to the new order of things there, the Filipinos believe they have a right to expect the same or similar treatment in the event of our withdrawal. On their side, it is reported, they are willing, during that period of readjustment, so to limit production of sugar as to prevent it from working an undue hardship to those in the United States who have invested in the competitive products.

The Filipino people have the conviction that if the date of independence were precisely and irrevocably fixed their representatives and those of the United States could soon jointly, and amicably, evolve a plan for the adjustment of all the disagreements and difficulties incident to the cessation of our sovereignty in the islands. These islanders are aware that every day's delay tends, by that much, to maximize the problems. They fear that the growth of American investments and other commitments in the Philippines may be successfully pleaded as so many justifications for our reconsideration of the promises we have given them.

Connoted in this question of tariffs and revenues is the cost of government of the Philippines. Unfortunately, there is a popular misconception in America that the United States is spending vast sums of money in the Philippine Islands for public works and for the maintenance of government, and this inspires the false notion that were we to withdraw from the islands we should leave them bankrupt. This might be dismissed as a silly delusion if it were not a fabrication intended to deceive the American people. I compress in a sentence the truth about the cost of government in the Philippines.

Except for the maintenance of the United States Army and Navy in the islands, the salaries of the two Resident Commissioners of the Philippines, and a portion of the cost of the Coast and Geodetic Survey in the islands, every expense for governmental operations—central, provincial, and municipal—in the Philippines, comes from the tax sources of the islands. Even an allowance of $50,000 for the expenses of the Schurman Commission, which President McKinley sent to the islands, was later repaid to the United States from the Philippine treasury. So far as the Filipinos are concerned, the cost of our military and naval establishment in the Philippines is a useless expenditure. In more than 30 years there has never been need either for the Army or Navy to put down colonial revolt, riot, or other outbreak.

Under powers given by Congress, and with but few limitations—among them, of course, the presidential and congressional vetoes—the Philippine central government and the provincial and municipal governments raise by taxation the revenues they require, formulate their own financial policies, and pay every cent of the cost. The governmental affairs of the Philippines have been and are being well managed. The administrators are almost without exception all natives.
